—The 25th anniversary of the pastorate of F. D. Power, Washington, D. C., was appropriately observed Sept. 30th. The church was handsomely decorated and the sermon of special interest. This quarter of a century covers a remarkable period of the world's history. In it have occurred some wonderful changes; some marvelous improvements; some great strides in progress. Bro Power has done a "power of good" during this long pastorate in the capital of the nation for the cause of humanity and of primitive Christianity. Long may he live to continue this glorious work in this great city.

—The new General Catalogue of the Christian Publishing Co. will be ready for delivery by the time this paper reaches our readers. It will be sent free to all requesting a copy.

—G. L. Cook, now partor of the Church of Christ in Geneva, Ohio, and who expects to attend the convention at Kansas City next week, would like to engage with some church or evangelist in a protracted meeting to follow the convention. Bro. Cook is a singing evangelist and would like to aid some church or pastor in this capacity before returning to his work in Ohio. Bro. Cook was assistant pastor to Bro. Fannon of this city for one year and made a fine impression upon the church and the people by his efficient services and excellent Christian deportment. Any church or evangelist wanting the services of a singing evangelist soon could not do better than to secure Bro. Cook. Address him at once at Geneva, O.

—Brother Albert Bellingham, who for two years was in the field as a singing evangelist, and who for nearly four years has been musical director and pastor's helper at the Church of Christ (Disciples) at Worcester, Mass, is on January 1st, 1901, to again enter the field as a singing evangelist and pastor's helper, believing that the experience received in being for four years settled in active life with a progressive and active church has peculiarly fitted him for the work. He would be pleased to correspond with any pastors or churches desiring his services in this department of the Lord's vineyard. Address until January 1st, 1901, Worcester, Mass; after that date, E. Palestine, O.

—We exhort our readers to remember that our current book offers—"The Biographical and Historical Library" and "The Home Library"—will be withdrawn November 1. There will be no extension of time. If any have missed reading these great offers, they may find them repeated on the last page of this issue of the Christian-Evangelist. We are receiving many enthu-iastic letters of appreciation and thanks from delighted patrons who have purchased these sets of books.

—W. H. McClain, who conducted a large company of Christian Endeavorers through Europe last summer, will tell the story of the Passion Play as they saw it at Oberammergau, at the First Christian Church of this city on Thursday evening of the present week. The narrative is to be illustrated by stereopticon views made from photographs taken during the present year. That the address will be interesting is without controversy.

—The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle has become a great educational affair. It affords advantages alike to those who can or who cannot secure a collegiate education. The Chautauqua gives to everyday people the opportunity to enjoy the advantages of an education beyond that furnished by the common schools and brings the facilities for self-culture to the family fireside. We not only commend such a work, but advise that all who stand in need of it send to their headquarters in Cleveland, O., for literature on its nature and advantages.

The Stimulus of Pure Blood

That is what is required by every organ of the body, for the proper performance of its functions.

It prevents biliousness, dyspepsia, constipation, kidney complaint, rheumatism, catarrh, nervousness, weakness, faintness, pimples, blotches, and all cutaneous eruptions.

It perfects all the vital processes.

W. P. Keeton, Woodstock, Ala., took Hood's Sarsaparilla to make his blood pure. He writes that he had not felt well but tired for some time. Before he had finished the first bottle of this medicine he felt better and when he had taken the second was like another man-free from that tired feeling and able to do his work.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

—The church in Unionvil'e, Mo., was recently made happy by the burning of its church mortgage. This event occurred on the last Sunday in September at the evening service. The pastor, R. L. Prunty, who has served that church for five years and nine months, has closed his work there. He has not yet decided upon a new location, but a man of such efficiency in church work will not be long without an effectual call. Bro. Prunty has done a good work in Unionville and the people will regret his departure, but we trust that a suitable man will be found for the place and that Bro. P. may be called to do a similar good work in some other needy field.

—The following special dispatch to the Christian-Evangelist will be a matter of great joy to the C. W. B. M. workers throughout the country. It shows that the C. W. B. M. work is making persistent and rapid headway as a missionary enterprise:

—That some manufacturers are awake to the evils of the present industrial system is evident from their efforts to better the condition of their employees and in this respect the National Cash Register Company seems to be at the front. One of the difficulties of the situation is very clearly stated in the following paragraph from an article in the Social Service for September. The article was suggested by the efforts of the National Cash Register Company to improve former conditions in these respects.

The practice of exacting maximum labor for minimum wage, and placing all responsibility on a factory superintendent, was abolished. The old method of employing labor was also discontinued, and gave place to a more thoughtful one whereby the most competent were accepted for service with the company. Only those were given employment who could offer good health, good character, intelligence, enterprise and sympathetic willingness as testimonicles. To attract high-class workmen of this character the maximum wage was paid, the hours shortened, the factory surroundings beautified, the sanitary conditions perfected, helpful literature distributed, and every encouragement and stimulus offered to originality, individuality and enterprise.

-E. L. Frazler writes us that the permanent tabernacle at Marion, Ind., will be dedicated Oct. 21. L. L. Carpenter in the lead. It will seat seven hundred.

-We have received a copy of the 16th annual report of the work done by our missionaries in Japan under the auspices of our Foreign Missionary Society and are pleased with the evidences of progress therein presented. The pamphlet contains several cuts of native Christians who are doing active service in the Master's work in Japan. A summary of the work will appear in the report of the Foreign Board which we are to publish in our next issue.

-Word comes to us on going to press that Brother and Sister R. A. Martin, of Novelty, Mo., have been called to mourn the loss of their son Bernard, age 15 monshs. These parents have our sympathy in this sorrow through which they are called to pass. May the promises of God's Word and his grace comfort their hearts.

-The beautiful church building just completed in Bedford, Iowa, at a cost of $11,500, was dedicated on last Sunday by F. M. Rains, of Cincinnati. Ohio. Four thousand dollars was raised and the balance of $500 guaranteed before the dedicatory services took place. The brethren are happy over their success and especially that of Bro. Rains in raising the money. J. W. Walters is the pastor of this congregation.

-The last number of The Clarion, local organ of the Central Christian Church, this city, contains the following card from its retiring pastor, Baxter Waters:

The present pastor takes this opportunity to express his appreciation of the many courtesies and personal kindnesses shown him during his stay in St. Louis. There have been many pleasant experiences and many things to encourage and to inspire hope and strengthen faith. While the work has been heavy, yet the association with good, consecrated workers has lightened the bur-dens. And many times poor sermons have been dens. And many times poor sermons have been preached but some one has always volunteered to cheer the preacher and bid him press on. May the Lord prosper and bless you all and en-able you to win souls for Christ.

Bro. Waters' hearers will generally testify that he very seldom, if ever, preached "poor sermons." His preaching has been not only thoughtful, denoting careful preparation, but spiritually uplifting. He will be followed into his new field of labor, wherever it may be, with the prayers and good wishes of the Central Church and his fellow ministers in the city.

WILSON & HUSTON, Evangelists.

-At the preachers' meeting held in this office on last Monday resolutions of regret at the departure of D. R. Dungan and Baxter Waters from the city and from this association were unanimously passed. As before stated, Bro. Dungan was pastor of the Mt. Cabanne Church and is now president of Christian University, Canton, Mo. Bro. Waters was the pastor of Central Christian Church, but closed his labors therewith Oct. 1. The resolutions adopted expressed a very high appreciation of the efficient services rendered the cause of Christ by these two brethren while in the city, and the well wishes of the brethren in their new fields of labor.

-At the meeting of the Christian ministers of this city on last Monday the following additions were reported: At the First Church, 5; Mt. Cabanne, 1; Compton Heights, 5; Central, 1; Ellendale, 1. G. A. Hoffmann preached at Mt. Cabanne on Sunday morning and evening. S. M. Martin preached at the First Church last Sunday morning and Geo. F. Hall at night. W. E. Harlow began his protracted meeting at the Fourth Church on last Sunday. Bro. McAlister, who came to us from the Congregationalists, and who was baptized by the editor of this paper in the Central Church on last Saturday night, preached for the church on Sunday morning and evening, and has become its temporary pastor. S. M. Martin has come to the city to complete h's medical course in Barnes' Medical College.

-One of the best preachers' meetings held in this office for a long while, was held here on last Monday at eleven A. M. Besides the presence of all our pastors there were the following visitors: Rev. Bates, pastor Kirkwood Baptist Church; Rev. Bronson, pastor Baptist Church in Belleville, Ill.; Geo. F. Hall, late pastor Tabernacle Christian Church, Decatur, Ill., and W. E. Harlow, of Parsons, Kan. Besides these there were present of our own brethren, Bro. Carter, Bro. Stull, Bro. Burns, G. A. Hoffmann and others. Bro. Hall is in the city giving a course of three lectures at the Central Y. M. C. A. Building. Bro. Harlow has come to our city to assist Bro. McFarland, of the Fourth Church, in a protracted meeting. The two Baptist brethren dropped in 'o become acquainted and to hear Bro. McAlister's reasons for changing his church relations. His address was the leading feature of the sessions and was a plain, sensible view of present conditions in the religious world.

-The writer was honored with an invitation to deliver an address at the Illinois State Convention in Bloomington last week on "The Christian at the Ballot Box," and greatly enjoyed the trip, the appreciative audience and what he saw and heard at the convention. The attendance, harmony and enthusiasm of the convention was a matter of remark by all. We did not hear any of the addresses save the closing one, by F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, but we heard many words of praise of them all. The reports of the various departments of work in the state were also encouraging. The weather was fine and the trip over the cornfields of Illinois in the Chicago & Alton's new limited

Over-Work Weakens Your Kidneys.

Unhealthy Kidneys Make Impure Blood.

All the blood in your body passes through your kidneys once every three minutes.

The kidneys are your blood purifiers, they filter out the waste or impurities in the blood. If they are sick or out of order, they fail to do their work.

Pains, aches and rheumatism come from excess of uric acid in the blood, due to neglected kidney trouble.

Kidney trouble causes quick or unsteady heart beats, and makes one feel as though they had heart trouble, because the heart is over-working in pumping thick, kidney-poisoned blood through veins and arteries.

It used to be considered that only urinary troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all constitutional diseases have their beginning in kidney trouble.

you are sick you can make no mistake by first doctoring your kidneys. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases and is sold on its merits by all druggists in fiftycent and one-dollar sizes. You may have a sample bottle by mail Home of Swamp-Root free, also pamphlet telling you how to find out if you have kidney or bladder trouble. Mention this paper when writing Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

Then the city of Bloomington is a splendid convention city. But we shall leave the report of the convention to some one who was present throughout and can better report its W. W. H.

Not a Tobacco User.

Among those who have written me sending pledge to take a copy of my book, is a brother who says: "But if you use tobacco, I don't want it." I desire to say, for the information of this brother and all others who wish to know, that I do not use tobacco in any way. It has been a long time since I abandoned its use. I did so because my ideas of Christian purity forbade such indulgence. Hence, it is a matter of principle to avoid tobacco. Is this enough? Or shall I write an article showing why Christians shoul | not use D. M. BREAKER.

ALMOST BLIND 15 YEARS WITH GRANULATED SORE

This is a copy of a letter written by Rev. F. N. Calvin, Colorado Springs, Col., to a gentleman who wrote him concerning Dr. J. Harvey Moore, the oc-ulist, 648 Century Building, St. Louis, Mo.:

DEAR SIR:—When I went to Dr. Moore I was suffering with ulcers on my eyes, the result of granulations which I had had for fifteen years. I had been treated by several of the best oculists in the United States, all of whom pronounced my case incurable. I had not been able to do any general r ading for two years. After two months' treatment from Dr. Mocre, I could do all my own reading and writing, and have continued to do it up to the present time, and have had no trouble with my eyes since I went to Dr Moore nearly I saw cures wrought by him that four years ago. were marvelous indeed. In all my dealings with him I ever found him to be a conscientious, Chris-ian gentleman. He did everything in my case that he promised to do. Very truly yours,

F. N. CALVIN.

If you or your friends have any trouble with your eyes, write Dr. Moore at once.

J. C. Hanna began work as pastor at Liscomb, Ia., October 1st.

Percy Leach has removed from Moulton, Ia., to 6 E. Divinity Street, New Haven, Conn., and is now pleasantly located in Yale.

S. W. Crutcher began his work as pastor of the Church in Harrisonville, Mo., Oct. 7. The Church in Harrisonville and in Missouri will be glad to have Bro. C. with them again.

W. L. Fisher, who was pastor of the Church in Bellaire, Ohio, is now at Yale. He is studying for the degree of B. D. H. H. Moninger, of Mont-He is studying Ind., is also a student in the same class, second year.

Robt. Sellers has closed his work as field secretary of Butler College and is open to engagement for a few protracted meetings before locating. His first meeting will be held with the Morris St. Church, Indianapolis, Ind., and he may be addressed at 1536 Asb., of that city.

Bro. Fisher, of Roseville, Ill., says: "Bro. E. E. Violett, of Rigsdon, Ill., began work in this place the last of August. He is quite young—only 20—yet he preaches the Old Jerusalem Gospel with power, and as a result six candidates were immersed to-night. Next Sunday evening he will preach to the doubters. C. E. We will begin a meeting in November.

W. C. Swartz, of Olney, Ill., says: "At a recent convention in Fairfield, Ill., C. Edwards, Albion, was elected President of the Seventh District; J. A. Battenfield, Vice-President, and W. C. Swartz, Olney, Secretary Treasurer. The board of officers have engaged and put to work Bro Isaac Beck-lehymer, of Eureka. Bro. B will visit the churches and look after the business interests of the district in the capacity of state evangelist for the Seventh District. Others will be put to work as soon as possible. Bro. B's address is Fairfield.

Rev. J. G. M. Luttenberger, of Dorchester, while traveling in Europe recently came across an old Bible at Strassburg, Germany. This book is probably the oldest Bible in America. It is the original translation of Martin Luther and was published in 1729, 171 years ago, and contains all the original comment, prayers and harmony of the Gospel as analyzed in 1530. The Bible was found after the bombardment when the German army left Strassburg. Martin Luther's greatness is visible in the translation of this wonderful work. Mr. Luttenberger poss sses in it a great curiosity but also a belonging of much literary merit.

Joe Shelby Riley, who has been pastor of the church at Cripple Creek, Col., for the past fourteen months, during which time the church has nearly trebled its membership, and built a splen-did new house of worship, is now closing his work did new house of worship, is now closing his work there, and will locate elsewhere. Bro. Riley re grets to leave the work at Cripple Creek, but the altitude is so trying on Mrs. Riley's nerves that a change has become necessary. He is a little above thirty-two years of age, and has always done successful work as a pastor or evangelist. He is recommended by his local board and the State Evangelist as an able speaker and sermonizer, a vigorous and untiring worker, a thorough and provigorous and untiring worker, a thorough and pro-found Bible student, and a gentleman of high standing among all religious bodies in the town and district. Bro. Riley would be glad to correspond with churches in need of pastor or evangelistic work, preferring the settled pastorate. His address is Box 1243, Cripple Creek, Col., or he may be seen at the convention at Kansas City, Oct. 11-18.

Wanted-An Organ.

The latest word from Galveston shows that there are only twenty members of the church in the city. Only one of that number has a salary. The State Board of Texas and the American Christian Missionary Society will stand by that work in an effort to resurrect it. The church needs rebuilding and this will be done by the special offerings sent to us in behalf of Galveston. They need also an organ. Perhaps some congregation or some friend of our work will donate an organ to the Galveston church. If so, will you please write me? BENJ. L. SMITH.

James McAllister.

We present our readers this week with a good half-tone picture of Brother James McAllister late pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church Detroit, Mich., who was baptized in the Centra Christian Church of this city on Saturday evening last, in the presence of a company of disciples from the various churches, and who filled the pulpit of the Central Christian Church morning and evening, last Lord's day. Brother McAllister has been employed as temporary supply for the pri of the Central Christian Church until the first of January. He has been brought to this change of church relationship by conscientious convictions and leaves a church which was much devoted to him, and to which he was closely attached. He was born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, in January 1863, and is therefore only thirty-seven years of sge He was educated inUnion College, Onio, and afterwards graduated at the Chicago Theological Seminary. At the close of his seminary course he was ordained a minister in the Congregational Church. He has held pastorates at Minneapolis; Alpena Mich.; Chicago and Detroit, covering in all a period of fifteen years. The church at Detroit passed resulutions of a highly complimentary character expressing its high appreciation of his character and of his work. He has no grievance, therefore, with the brethren whom he leaves, but he feels that the religious body with which he has identified bimself is in closer harmony with the New Testament than the one which he has left, and for that reason he comes among us. He addressed our Ministers' Meeting last Monday, giving the reasons which induced him to mak change. He has already made a most favorable impression on the church, and upon our ministers in the city. It is his purpose to attend the Kansas City Convention and those who recognize him from his picture should greet him as a brother in Christ, that he may feel thoroughly at home among us.

Christian University Students. Attention.

At some convenient place and time during the General Convention at Kansas City, a meeting of the Alumni, past and present students of the Christian University will be held. It is requested that every such student or alumnus shall report on arrival in the city, or as soon thereafter as possible, at the office of the State Board of Missions, 1123 Oak Street. The Church and a Beneficiary System.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST:-I am not a reacher, neither am I a writer, but I will atempt to write a few lines touching an article in the HRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Sept. 20th, entitled, "A hurch Beneficiary System." The writer asks the hurches to organize a beneficiary system for hurch members. He says the ties of the aternal orders are stronger than church ties and hat young men seek the society of lodge brethren ather than church brethren. He says the condi-ons of modern life are such that the beneficiary ociety is necessary.

I admit the young men and many young women re drifting into the fraternal orders and paying uch more money into them than they are into the hurches; but what is the cause? Is it possible hat our blessed Lord gave his life for the church r for us, and made a failure in giving laws that re not sufficient to hold the church together, and e must add something to them to meet the de-ands of the church members? Is there anything odd in the lodge that ought not to be in the hurch? Are we not yoking ourselves up with nbelievers in the lodge? Christ provided for the ick and needy in the church. Is not the trouble with the church? It has got to mingling too such with the world in having festivals and en-ertainments of all kinds for the purpose of raisng money, and the average church member has nore desire for entertainment than they have for he church. Many preachers are going into the odge and the members follow them. I am satised these things are injuring the churches. ot time some of our strong men speak out boldly in these things? A reader of the Christian-Vangelist. Respectfully, J. P. Pack. VANGELIST. Respectfully, Galva, Kan., Sept. 26, 1900.

[We sympath!ze with the feeling that if a large part of the time, energy and means spent by proessed Christians in connection with the various odges were devoted to the church it would be astly better for the members now devoted to heir lodges and for the Church of Christ. We o not, however, sympathize with the idea someimes advanced that the church as such should ssume responsibility for every enterprise or orcanization looking to the material welfare of its nembers. We believe both fire insurance and ife insurance, wisely managed, to be worthy enerprises, of which Christian people should avail hemselves for their protection. We do not be-ieve, however, the church should load itself with uch responsibilities, thereby hindering its great work of ministering to the spiritual needs of men. f fraternal organizations, aside from the church, n its normal work, are found to be useful, it were better for these to be formed independent of the church, even though made up of its members, than to attempt to use the church organization for a purpose for which it was not designed. The church should so influence society at large that all organizations necessary for men's well-being should be managed on principles of righteousness sand justice, including all branches of legitimate business and human government itself; but it would be a fatal mistake for the church to turn aside from its great spiritual mission to become a divider of estates, a mutual insurance society or a civil government. These ends it accomplishes indirectly, but not directly.—Editor.]

Oklahoma Christian Convention

The tenth annual convention of the Church of Christ of the Territory of Oklahoma met at Guthrie, the capital, on September 25-27. Guthrie is quite a little city of near 10,000 people. The territory now claims near 400,000 inhabitants. There are 110 Christian churches and near 10,000 members. There were 48 churches that reported 1,242 additions. Of the 110 congregations 55 report houses of worship. The other 55 worship in court-houses, halls, school-houses, barns, private houses, dugouts and groves. Thirteen new houses were built this last year. There are 92 preachers in the territory, but most of them are on claims and do more or less farming. One of these men said to the writer: "I have preached in dugouts where the centipedes crawled up the wall, the lizards came down and we were compelled to kill the snakes before we could begin our preaching." This reveals some of the conditions in a new country Here are a large number of our brethren out on the frontier trying to make homes for themselves and their pisterity. Under such unfavorable conditions they are forging ahead and in the larger towns have built some splendid houses of worship. They deserve our sympathy and our substantial

The convention was said to be the largest ever held in the territory. Near 100 delegates were present. Some of these delegates drove 100 miles across the country to be present. They were enthusiastic and full of the spirit of self-sacrifice. Two brethren volunteered to give their time as evangelists without cost to the board. Such devotion will certainly be rewarded. The program rendered was strong and practical. All manifested the true spirit of work for the Master. The Hon. Dick T. Morgan, who has been the president of the convention for ten years and again reelected, delivered one of the night addresses, which was heartily received. Others who spoke were A. B. Carpenter, C. H. Van Dolah, J. T. Ogle, H. L. Hutchinson, E. M. Barney, Junius Wilkins, J. B. Boen, J. M. Monroe and W. A. Humphrey. The reports showed progress and rapid gains.

The session of the C. W. B. M. was presided over by Mrs. J. M. Monroe, El Reno. Her address was highly appreciated. C. H. Everest, Oklahoma City, made the report, which showed 222 members in 12 societies. Most of these were organized during the last year. A number of other addresses were made. All indicated a high degree of spirituality and culture.

We were no little surprised at finding so many Missourians in this convention. R. L. Morton, formerly of Troy, Mo, was a leading spirit in the convention; A. B. Carpenter, likewise, is quite active in the work in the Territory. J. T. Ogle is just getting down to his work at Guthrie. He was elected a member of the territorial board. Then, there were N. H. Robertson, Junius Wilkins, brethren Smith, Blazer and others, all formerly Missourians. Bro. Ogle and the church at Guthrie cared nicely for the convention. On account of constant heavy rains the local attendance was All seemed to enjoy the convention and seemed to be determined to attempt larger things for the future.

Montana State Convention.

At the recent conventions of the Montana Christian Association, together with the State Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and the Bible-school and Endeavor Associations, held at Helena, Mont., an interesting program was carefully followed, which was full of live topics and helpful discussions. The reports of the work done in the state have to be studied in order to realize what a wonderful work is being done by the handful of Disciples in this state of Montana. The number of organized churches are 14, enrolling 1,055 members. The increase by baptism for the year was 64, by letter 56, and by statement 55, making a total of 175, against which there was a loss of 81 by death, letter and otherwise, making a net gain of 94. The members of the churches during the past year contributed towards missions the sum of $1,133.32, and for home and state work, the sum of $12,006.29, making a total of $13 139.-61, or an average of $12.45 per member. This does not include the money raised by the C. W. B. M. auxiliaries, the Bible schools or the Endeavor Societies, whose reports are given below. The 14 church buildings are valued at $70,000 with a total debt of all of the churches amounting to $9,182.32, being a decrease of nearly $1,200 for the past year.

The officers elected by the Montana Christian Association for the ensuing year are S. C. Kenyon, President; E. O. Tilburn, Vice-President; E. Scharnikow, Rec. Sec.; O. F. McHargue, Treas., and Walter M. Jordan, Cor. Sec.

The financial report of State C. W. B. M. showed that 197 members contributed $629.35 towards missionary work, or an average of about $3.25 per member. Many contributions from the state were made direct, and not reported through the State Board, which would swell the average considerably. The officers elected for the ensuing year are as follows: President, Mrs. C. P. Brinton. of Butte; Mrs. Ada Pew, of Helena, for Vice-President; Miss E. L. Botts, of Butte, for Secretary and Treasurer, and Miss Ada Walrath, of Bozeman, as Junior Supt. The Bible-school reports show an enrollment of 772, and having raised for self support and missions the sum of $850.19 There are 12 organized Bible-schools. There were eight C. E. Societies reported with a membership of 255, and who contributed to missions the sum of $615.02.

The total contributions for the year aggregate $15,234.17, from the churches and their auxiliary departments. A state evangelist was employed for six months during the year. His work but emphasized the necessity of a state evangelist's being at work in the state during the whole year. The convention, feeling the need of this, in addition to keeping up the work in the established churches, appointed a special delegate to the National Convention, to present the ne-ds of Montana to those noble women who have so far made it possi-ble that Christian work might be carried on in Montana, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The delegate so selected was the State Corresponding Secretary, Walter M. Jordan. EDWARD SCHARNIKOW.

The Terrible Turk at Home,

There are a few more things which must be said about Constantinople before passing on to Greece, Italy and Gibraltar. One is struck at every turn with the fact that in this city there seems to be little or no municipal control, or organized effort for securing those ends for which, according to our western ideas, our municipalities exist. There is plenty of police surveillance, to be sure, which commonly takes the form of annoying restrictions upon foreigners who wish to do business, and of watchful curbing of the tongues of those who might feel disposed to speak ill of the government. As I was leaving Constantinople, the boat did not start on schedule time and we sat at dinner in the cabin while the boat was still moored to the dock. A Greek coal merchant and his wife sat opposite me. We were speaking of governments and the Greek woman began to express her opinion of the one whose domain we were about to leave. Suddenly I felt some one step on my toe and the look of disquiet upon the merchant's face led me to believe that he intended a warning to his wife. She kept right on, of course, and half a minute later I saw him give her a covert nudge. The topic of conversation was changed. When we were well out at sea on our Egyptian vessel, flying the British flag, there was ample opportunity to say those things which the merchant had not considered it quite prudent to say while we were in the harbor of Constantinople.

But aside from this sort of governmental spying, there seems to be little or no united municipal effort. The place of water-works is supplied by wells and cisterns, many of which are in connection with the mosques, and by the water-pedlars who carry goat-skin bags of water in true Oriental fashion. Street lights are so infrequent that the sight of one causes a shock of surprise. Street cars do not exist, except one single track line, the cars of which, as they journey up Galata Hill to Pera, resemble unpainted goods boxes drawn by four mules. The city has apparently never been surveyed and no hillock has been leveled or depression filled to make the grade of a street easier. In short, the city as a whole seems to perform absolutely no function. It is an aggregation of about a million people (no one knows exactly, for there never has been a census), but they live the life of isolated farmers, enjoying none of the benefits of association. They are not theoretically individualists, perhaps, and they would be the last people in the world of whom political individualism could be predicated. Put they are social and industrial individualists. The workman does not work in a factory. He sits on his heels in a little open-front shop and plies his craft on his own account. The products of his art are placed in front where the passer by can see. If a customer comes, he stops work and sells what he can. He does not pay water rates, but carries his own water from the nearest fountain. The city collects from him no money for the maintenance of a police force; he takes his chances with thieves, or hires a private watchman if he can afford it. No money of his passes through the city treasury into the hands of a garbage contractor; the dogs that live on his block attend to all that. We of the western world fancy that we represent individualism. Politically, perhaps, we Religiously, perhaps, we do. But in the world of industry and in all of those things which pertain to the art of comfortable living, we are the true exponents of solidarity, and the Oriental is your true individualist.

I have made a passing reference to the dogs of Constantinople, and they deserve more than that. I would not think it worth while to repeat what every traveler says of their astounding number and marvelously hideous appearance, but it seems to me they deserve a word or two of more kindly recognition. In the first place there are about seventy-five of them to the block. I have counted that many where they seemed but little thicker than usual. Nobody owns them, but each dog is attached with absolute fixity to the precinct wherein he was born, and the dogs of each block exhibit great zeal in repelling all canine invaders. Naturally the corners become a dark and bloody border ground where warfare often rages.

But this is not the quality which I wish to commend,—although it does seem to me that their united effort in maintaining their territorial rights exhibits a higher degree of intelligence than the lack of co-operation among the humans in Constantinople. But they are dilgent, hard-working dogs. One who passes through the streets in the daytime and sees them asleep, as they usually are, and has to step over them and walk around them, might acquire the impression that they had no visible means of support; but after night-fall their work begins and as the scavengers of the city, they do valuable service.

They are always good-natured in the daytime and if you step on them or kick them out of the way, they only look at you with a mild, reproachful eye, more in sorrow than in anger. They are not used to that sort of treatment. The calm manner in which they will lie at full length in the middle of a busy street, and all over the sidewalk (if the street chances to have a side-walk) with a serene confidence that every one will be good enough notto disturb them, is a touching tribute to the considerateness of their human associates. Turk is, in fact, very good to his dogs and, although they are on the whole the most outrageously ill-conditioned brutes within my acquaintance, I never saw a person ill-treat one of them. Even their friends cannot claim that they are beautiful, but when a dog stays awake all night to do his duty as a scavenger and keeps his temper in the daytime, even when a passing Christian, less considerate than his Mohammedan friends, steps on his tail, it seems to me that he is going far toward performing the whole duty of dog. The Constantinopolitan dog can never be exaggerated, but I maintain that he has been grossly maligned.

As regards the people, I was much impressed by the appearance of the children and the old men. Many of the latter, clad in black frock coat and red fez, and with eyes as black as their hair was white, appeared to be embodiments of that trustworthy, intelligent and benevolent type of man who is at once president of a bank and superintendent of a Sunday-school. Of the children, I liked the beggars best. It is such a relief to be approached by a mendicant who is undisguisedly happy. No specious misery distorts their countenances. They feign no grief for the present, nor apprehension for the future. They approach you with an ebullition of contagious merriment and frankly appeal to you, as a person of wealth and a good fellow, to contribute ten paras to the enlargement of their joy. Occasionally, to be sure, they will point to their mouths to indicate hunger, after which they will laugh uproariously and turn handsprings and return to solicit ten paras again. Sometimes, too, they will call your attention to their scanty apparel. But in the sweltering streets of Constantinople, this can scarcely be interpreted as a serious plea for pity. Perhaps it is rather an explanation of their joy. Altogether, I do not know where I have seen a more attractive set of children, or brighter-looking ones, than those of Constantinople.

I have said nothing as yet about the great "sights" of the city-the museum of antiquities, the bazaars, the old Seraglio, the ancient city wall, and the many mosques which claim a visit. The latter are in architecture not unlike the older Russian church, both being Byzantine in type, but the similarity stops at the door, for the mosque is devoid of images and pictures. The worship of Mohammed is, in fact, carried on with far less paraphernalia than is used by either the Greek or the Roman Church, and their regular services offer nothing more spectacular than the foot-washing before the service and the repeated genuflections of the faithful toward Mecca. The washings which are enjoined by the Koran are not mere ceremonial purifications. They wash to get clean and go at it with soap. This wise requirement has made the Turks one of the cleanest peoples in

There are five regular calls to prayer every day in a Mohammedan mosque. Of course nobody can go every time, for the Turk, although very religious, is seldom religious enough to allow it to interfere with his business. Still, they are very good church-goers and there are a great many of them who go more than once every day. It is contrary to Moslem ideas of decency and order for any one to wear in the mosque the same footcovering which he wears in the street. Ordinary people meet this requirement by taking off their shoes at the door and washing their feet either in the fountain, which usually stands in front of the mosque, or at the appointed places inside. Some who go to mosque very frequently wear overshoes in the street and kick them off as they step upon the sacred floor. Christian visitors are required to put on felt slippers over their shoes. At the hours of prayers many Turks kneel upon their prayer-mats and perform their devotions toward Mecca, in street, shop or market. The Russian performs his out-of-door devotional exercises in certain places, before certain pictures or chapels, irrespective of the hour; the Turk does his at certain hours, irrespective of place.

The pulpit or altar of every mosque is placed so that the worshipers facing it shall look toward Mecca, just as most Greek and Roman churches have the altar to the east. Now it happens that Mecca is considerably south of east from Constantinople; and it also happened that, when the Turks took possession of that city, they converted into mosques the Christian churches which they found there. Here a difficulty arose, for whereas the churches all pointed east, it was necessary that as mosques they should point southeast. The difficulty was met by placing the pulpit near one corner and running diagonally the strips of carpet upon which the faithful kneel for their devotions. The result is a peculiarly twisted effect, as if the floor had remained fixed while the walls and roof had been pulled around about twenty degrees by a cyclone. The mosque of St. Sophia exhibits this peculiarity, as do all the others which were formerly Christian churches.

It is curious to note in what a bungling fashion the crosses and other Christian symbols have been obliterated from these converted buildings. As a rule the cross has been demolished, where it appears carved in relief, by simply hacking away the projecting arms in such a rude fashion that the original form is not in the least disguised. In a good many places, too, the symbol has apparently been overlooked, and for four hundred and fifty years has remained as a silent witness of the ceremonies of Islam.

It will, of course, be remembered that the Sultan is head of the Mohammedan religion, just as the Czar of Russia is the head of the Russian Church, and in a much more real sense than the Queen of England is head of the Anglican Church. The Sultan's position, on its religious side, corresponds much more nearly to that of high priest. There are certain functions in connection with the celebrations of the sacred month of Ramazan which he alone can perform. His annual visit to the Mantle of the Prophet, which is preserved in a mosque in Stamboul, may be likened to the annual entrance of the Jewish high priest into the Holy of Holies. The crowning feature of the day's celebration, after the visit to the Mantle, is the marriage of the Sultan, which also takes place annually. Of course the Sultan may be married as many times as he pleases during the year, but it is a religious duty for him to take a new wife on every twenty-fifth day of the month Ramazar.

My visit to Constantinople was made doubly pleasant by meeting there my old friends, Mr. and Mrs. Chapman, who are in the employ of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, doing missionary service among the Armenians. The missionary property is located in the heart of the Armenian district in Stamboul and appears well adapted for the work. Bro. Shishmanian lives next door and Mr. and Mrs. Chapman across the street, watched over by the protecting care of a Turkish policeman who boasts of having killed two men in the last Armenian massacre. The school was closed for its short summer vacation, when I was there, but I visited the property and also spent some time with Mr. and Mrs. Chapman at the Princes' Islands, a dozen miles from the city in the Sea of Marmora, where they were spending their vacation, and we had a joyous time together, talking over the present conditions of their difficult field, recalling old days at Bethany, and riding donkeys around the little island.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The origin of the Disciples of Christ was a desire on the part of B. W. Stone, the Campbells and others, for the speedy evangelization of man. The movement was, in its beginning, distinctly evangelistic. The favorite text of the men with whom the movement began was:

"Neither for these only do I pray, but for them also that believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us: that the world may believe that thou didst send may."

Especial emphasis was placed on the last words of this quotation from the Lord's Prayer-THAT THE WORLD MAY BELIEVE -and their contention was that the unity and union of believers in the Christ must precede the conversion of the world. Their plea for Christian union was, therefore, that the world might by the testimony of a united Church be led to faith in Christ. The evangelization of man was the point of special interest to these grand men. Our early preachers were evangelists, and it would have been an inexplicable anomaly if the Disciples had not, at an early period in their history, organized for aggressive gospel work. "The Christian Association, of Washington, Pa.," was merely or chiefly an organization for the sounding out of the good news. When we cease to be an evangelistic people we cease to be loyal to our fundamental principles.

The young men in the University of Chicago have recently been studying the subject of evangelism. Dr. H. L. Willett not long since gave an address in which there was the evangelistic fire of "the fathers." The brethren are prayerfully considering this work. How to reach the people with the tidings of salvation is the problem. And as they learn they practice. Almost all of our young men are engaged in mission work in

The Praise Hymnal.

"NINTH STREET CHRISTIAN CHURCH, Washington, D. C.

"With the opening of our new house of worship we introduced a new hymn book. Our music committee selected 'The Praise Hymnal,' and we have never regretted their choice. We found beautiful and appropriate hymns for our dedicatory service. For the varying seasons that have followed, and for all the regular and special services held, we have found this collection adequate to all needs.

"I wish to commend especially the collection of Psalms and Topical Selections from the Revised Version of the Scriptures. The use of these Responsive Readings has greatly enriched the worship of our Lord's Day meetings.

I have not been in any place where "the fathers" are more reverently studied than in the Disciples' Divinity House in Chicago. I confess that the interest in these studies which I find here came to me as a bit of a surprise. The interest amounts almost to an enthusiasm. There is an earnest effort to understand those who inaugurated this popular movement for Christian Union by a return to the Christianity of the Christ in ORDER TO THE CHRISTIANIZATION OF THE WORLD.

I am sure you will be interested in the following list of topics, which is a part of the regular course of instruction in the Divinity House: "Outlines of a History of the Disciples," "Origin of the Disciples," "History of Doctrine Among the Disciples," "History of the Idea of Christian Union," "Practical Problems Among the Disciples of Christ," "The Place of the Disciples of Christ Among the Religious Forces of To-day," "The Literature of the Disciples," and "The Aim of the Disciples."

In the Monday morning meeting of our preachers in "Parlor O," Palmer House, I found them discussing "Our Plea—What It Is, Its Pertinency to Present Conditions and How to Present It." Does not this statement of facts come to you in the nature of a surprise? Well, this is the spirit that I find in Chicago—especially among those who are foremost in promoting the interesst of the Divinity House. I do not see how anything but good can come out of this.

Among the Baptists, Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians and others, there is what is called "The Forward Movement" or "The Twentieth Century Movement." This topic came up in the Chicago Disciples Ministers' Meeting. A number of brethren were requested to report on these various movements. They all look toward the evangelization and education of the peoples of the earth. Is not this in obedience to the command of our Lord to "make disciples of all nations" and to "teach them to observe all" that he had, during his personal ministry among men, commanded?

In a subsequent letter I hope to be able to tell you something definite about these movements.

I wonder if the brethren will not inaugurate something of the kind in the Kansas City Convention. Let there be a great forward movement inaugurated, such as the world has never seen, in the interest of simple New Testament Christianity. Why not? The time is ripe for it.

The church for which J. H. O. Smith preached in Chicago, the Union Christian Church, meeting in the People's Institute Building on Van Buren and Leavitt Streets, is doing well-remarkably well under the circumstances. Bro. Smith left the church the last of May. Since then there has been no regular preacher, yet the audiences are large and the interest in every department of the work is good. One young man was baptized last night. Another young man confessed Christ and will be baptized next Lord's day evening. A week ago two young women were baptized and two weeks ago one. There was a congregation of 800 last evening. The Sunday-school yesterday numbered 422. The contribution was more than $10. The church last year collected and disbursed $6,200. The fiscal year closed September 30th. Subscriptions were taken yesterday for the next year. The number of subscriptions was only eighteen less than the corresponding period last year. There were 100 persons at prayermeeting Wednesday evening, Sept. 26th. The number of names on the church register is more than 1,000. There are probably from 500 to 600 bons fide members of the church. It is proposed to raise money to pay the current expenses of the church, about $100 a week, no one giving more than $1 a week. This was done last year, i. e., the year ending Sept. 30th. The congregation is united and zealous. It is made up almost entirely of men and women who are poor in this world's goods. The church is unusually well organized. About four years ago J. H. O. Smith began this work. He builded well. It is a pleasure to jot down these facts. May the years of this member of the multitudinous Smith family be greatly increased and may they be filled with effective service for the Master. J. H. O. Smith has left Chicago, but his work abides.

Help the Galveston Church.

To the Disciples of Christ everywhere:

I beg another word of appeal. What can you do right now for the distressed church in Galveston? Twenty members are left; one of these has a moderate salary. One widow who may leave the city has a living. This is our resource—not $5.00 in sight for the support of the work from the members for months to come. Fifteen or twenty members who cannot live elsewhere than in Galveston have no winter clothing or shelter. The city for the next eight months will be full of skilled laborers, and the new population will be of the kind out of which to build a good church. Out of this awful ruin arises in Galveston a great opportunity. Please do what you can and remit as indicated in the papers.

Yours faithfully,

JESSE B. HASTON, Pastor.

New York Letter.

The New York State Convention at Niagara Falls was one of the best we have had in many years, both in the number of delegates and in the reports presented. Almost 200 people were present, outside the residents of the city. The program was good throughout, and the outlook is very encouraging for the future. The reports show that $2,327.72 came into the state work last year from the churches, while outside contributions brought the total up to $3,400. More than $700 of the old indebtedness was paid off.

Our missionary pastors are John L. Keevil, Brooklyn; R. W. Stevenson, Lansingburg; C. C. Crawford, Elmira; W. R. Motley, Watertown; M. Gunn, Gloversville, and N. L. Corey, Rochester. It is the policy of our state work to support missionary-pastors rather than employ evangelists. The conditions in the East are such that this policy is proven the wisest and best plan of work. Some removals from the state caused certain changes in the mission board for the ensuing year. F. W. Norton, our faithful and honored president for six years, having left the state, was succeeded in office by Dr. Eli H. Long, of Buffalo, whose interest in State Missions is both intelligent and strong. Every one is pleased that Dr. Long was elected to the presidency of our board. Since F. W. Norton chose to leave us for Indiana, we give him up with regret, and confidently expect great things from Dr. Long.

C. M. Kreidler also leaves our state to work in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. This, too, we all very much deplore, for he has proven himself one of the ablest and most worthy men the Empire state has ever had. C. M. Kreidler would grace any pulpit among us. I have spoken before of his great work at Troy, N. Y. Within ten months at North Tonawanda the membership of the church was increased by ninety-two additions, and every other line of work advanced in proportion. Under his efficient work as state secretary the work was brought up to the highest point it has attained in years. We all feel that we have lost from our state work one of our truest and best men. Milwaukee is to be congratulated. His place on the board was filled by the election of J. P. Lichtenberger, who gives promise of excellent work. J. M. Philputt, of New York, was elected chairman of the Ministerial Association for the ensuing year. The C. W. B. M. work of the past year was exceptionally good. Mrs. Laura C. Craig, of Buffalo, was elected president, Mrs. F. H Moore, New York, vice-president, Miss Lina Rogers, Syracuse, treasurer, and Mrs. Jennie Encell, Syracuse, state organizer.

Among those who have come into the ministerial ranks of the state since our last convention we recall the names of Jenkins, Jenny and Lichtenberger, of Buffalo, G. B. Townsend, of Troy, R. W. Stevenson, of Lansingburg and W. R. Motley, of Watertown, all of whom we welcome. The convention goes to Rochester next year, where we all expect to rejoice together over a good year's work. Two men in the state, absent from the convention, were often in the minds of those present-Dr. W. A. Belding and N. J. Aylesworth, both of whom are dearly beloved in the Lord by all who know them. Dr. Belding's advancing age prevented his coming as did Bro. Aylesworth's terrible affliction keep him away. To the former we sent a message of Christian greeting and love; to the latter a substantial token of affectionate sympathy. Dr. Belding belongs to the honored roll of the "fathers"; Bro. Aylesworth is one of the most gifted writers whose thoughts grace our Christian literature.

The trip to Niagara Falls was a delightful one over the line of Lackawanna railroad. Leaving New York on "The Queen City Special" at 10 A. M.

we are in Buffalo, 427 miles distant, at 8 o'clock, making but few stops, but speeding through a section of country unsurpassed anywhere in variety of scenery and interests. Across Northern New Jersey we pass many historic places associated with the fathers of the Republic and their heroic struggle for freedom; thence we speed through the Delaware Water Gap where the Delaware River rushes through a deep, narrow gorge in the mountains. Here is where many of the wealthy citizens of New York seek rest and recreation in the summer season. From this point our train, with many groans and much labor, climbs the Pocono Mountains, from the crest of which an inspiring panorama greets the eye; an extensive sweep of mountains, valleys, hills, farms and hamlets comes into view.

In a little while Scranton, the thriving metropolis of the anthracite coal region, is reached and looking out we see the streets thronged with miners on strike. They seem restless, going to and fro all the while, as if in great suspense. Leaving the Lackawanna region we pass over the mountains into the valley of the beautiful Susquehanna and pass through fair Binghamton, Owego, Elmira, Corning, Bath, Dansville and Mount Morris to Buffalo. The mind is kept busy recalling historic and industrial associations, from the colonial days to present. We can not recall all the points of interest, but a ride through this delightful country on the best and fastest train of the Lackawanna System will give one a pleasant and profitable experience never to be regretted.

The Disciples Club, F. M. Applegate, president, will soon re-open work for the season. Among those who have promised to speak at the meetings are, Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Mrs. Maud Balling ton Booth, Edwin Markham and Rev. Edward Everett Hale. Perhaps you think there is nothing distinctly after the order of New Testament teaching to be expected in this array of talent. Well, these are to be counterbalanced by such men as F. D. Power, Peter Ainslie, W. J. Wright, et al. Another task which the club has set before itself is to get all our churches in greater New York to advertise in the daily papers under one heading and thereby make an impression on the public mind. If the Disciples Club of New York would take up the matter of city church extension and give its whole time and strength to that, the cause of New Testament Christianity might be materially advanced in the metropolis. This should be our chief concern as the disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It was my pleasure to unite in marriage Mr. Benjamin Selover Ammerman and Miss Ada Josephine Tully, at the home of the bride's parent's, Mr. and Mrs. T. DeQuncy Tully, at 291 Seventh Avenue, Brooklyn, on Wednesday eveevening, Sept. 19. Miss Ada is theonly daughter of Brother and Sister Tully, who are delighted that she will not leave the city to make her home, but will live in Brooklyn. goodly company of friends were present to wish the bridal party much joy, and after the ceremony all were invited to refreshments "around the bridal cake." We wish them a long and happy

The work of the 169th Street Church starts off well this autumn. There have been confessions and baptisms almost every Lord's day since the vacation and the outlook for others to come is promising. The congregations are larger and more inspiring than usual and the Sunday-schools are growing. We hope to reconstruct our house of worship during the coming winter, a thing that we need very much to do, in order to the largest and best work possible. Let us hear from all and best work possible. Let us hear from all Eastern delegates to the Kansas City Convention, that we may arrange to go together S. T. WILLIS.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON: -I want to thank you for your very pointed and forcible answer to H. & R. in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of the 13th. I can fully sympathize with H. & R. For a number of years I was a temperance worker and yet voted the -- ticket, believing I ought to take the lesser of two evils, and that if I voted the Prohibition ticket my vote would be thrown away, as it stood no chance whatever of succeeding. Now I have gotten boyond that point and vote the Prohibition ticket whenever I have the opportunity. The old parties can take care of themselves. I consider the liquor question the most important issue before the American people to-day. Just as long as the Christian people of America allow themselves to be deceived by the flimsy, selfish arguments of the old parties, just so long will the liquor power flouri-h and control our government, from the president down to the constable. H. & R. and many other good people forget or fail to see that the liquor traffic is sustained to-day by the members of the churches of our country.

The Most Important Issue.

Take away the support, direct and indirect, of the members of the churches, and the saloon business would live but a short time. This is a deplorable fact, but it is true nevertheless. If the Christian people could only fully realize this truth and stand together, the great evil would soon be crushed. As you very truthfully say, "There are enough Prohibitionists in this country, if they would act in concert, to hold the balance of power." How long before they will learn to act in concert?

Very sincerely yours for the success of Prohibition. R. T. WALKER

Watch Coffee

AND WATCH IT CAREFULLY.

Any brain worker that depends on thought for his success in life, uses up daily, by brain work, a varying amount of delicate particles of phesphate of potash and albumen of which the brain and nerve centers are composed.

The fine, microscopic parti les of phosphate of potash are found in quantities in the pores of the skin after the brain has been used actively. This must be replaced from food, or brain fag and nervous prostration sets in.

This breaking down of the little cells each day, from brain work alone, is a natural process, and the cells can readily be built from the right sort of food, if the system is not interfered with by drugs, but if an increased amount of cells are broken down by the use of coffee, trouble then

Frequently it first shows in dyspepsia, lack of power of the bowels to operate properly, or palpitation of the heart or some other lack of vitality and healthy vigor. There is but one thing for a sensible man or woman to do-quit coffee absolutely. "Hard to do," you say. Take up Postum Food Coffee, use it regularly, have it well made, so it tastes good. You will find a well-defined, unmistakable change in your health, and there is a reason for it.

You have become free from the bresking down force of coffee, and on the other hand, you are taking a powerful, nourishing liquid food which quickly rebuilds new cells. These are facts, profound facts, ready for anyone to prove to their satisfaction by actual use. Postum Food offee is made at the famous pure food factories of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., and is used by brain workers all over the world. Don't call it a "substitute" for coffee; leave out the cof fee proposition altogether. Postum is a liquid food and a true food drink.

1281 Union Ave.

The Present Temperance Issue.

The apologists for the liquor business justify the saloon on the ground it is so much better than "blind pige" and "boot-legging," "free whisky." etc. But a new advance has been made in the devious ways of the defenders of the evil system to uphold the army grogshop called "the canteen."

We are told that the canteen is a defensive measure to keep the soldiers from going to the "low dives" for drinks. Low dives, indeed! Call them "low" when they hold a special commission from the government at Washington City and one from the State Capitol on the ground of the "good moral character of their proprietors?"

The "low dive," the "blind pig" and "the canteen" all come of the same "sphere of influence" conquered by the rum power in the political partles that perpetuated them and have given them "benevolent assimilation."

The Christian Churches which confess Christ as supreme are opposed to the whole license system, for its awful fruits are too manifest to be any longer denied or excused. It is deception in every point of view, and even its advocates are now apologizing for the canteen on the ground of the utter failure of the license system to curb or improve the credit of the liquor business.

To vote to continue the license system is to deny the voice of the church, and if the voice of the church truly represents Christ, then to vote for parties who practice it is to continue the license system against a party that opposes its continuance is to deny Christ. No Christian should put his ear to the ground to hear the voice of God on a question of this kind.

No such excuses as "the people are not ready," or "the choice between two evils," or the "other issues," of the wood, hay and stubble variety can justify a wholesome conscience against the present situation of affairs to longer continue it.

The voice of God is not heard in the feeble, shifting excuses by which many still justify their continuance of the now exploded license system. Its own advocates deny it and explode its falsity when they called licensed saloons "low dives." It is the nature of the business, and nothing else can ever come of it. It certainly is the duty of every believer in Christ to look the present situation fairly and honestly in the face. Things have greatly changed of late years.

At first the temperance question was a question between moderate drinking and drunkenness, and the Christian conscience said: "Be temperate." Then the question rose a degree higher and it was total abstinence against all drinking, and the Christian conscience said "touch not, taste not, handle not." Still, on went the question, and drinking holes were denounced and were prosecuted under the common law as nuisances and were nearly driven from our land, thirteen states having adopted prohibition. It was then that the barrel went out of the grocery and common store, for it became disreputable. It went out and went to itself, and returning took seven other devils with it, and the last state was worse than the

It was under the force of this common law, which treated the saloon as a nuisance, that the license system was hatched as we see it now fullgrown, that has proven to be, though not intended to be, the greatest festerer of the evil and the hardest enemy to meet, being entrenched in party politics.

When Christian vigilance had discovered this new and dangerous situation its inner conscience said: "The liquor traffic can never be licensed without sin," and it set up prohibition, and for more than a quarter of a century this controversy has raged, but it has taken a new turn and the question we meet now is the question of loyalty to our flag and our Christ against the rebellious encroachments of the liquor power on government and society. It not only shoots down the government detectives; it not only tramples upon all the Sunday laws and eleven o'clock laws and selling to minors laws and adulteration laws; it not only breaks down the old prohibition laws in the states and extends its power into our territories and our new possessions, but even makes null and void the law of Congress. Does any thinking man doubt the liquor power is bad enough to be treasonable? Then why should it not be? What does it lack but the occasion for it? Can the Christian fail to see what sort of position he will be in as any kind of an apologist or extensionist of that evil power when the nation once recognizes it as the paramount question, which it is sure to do?

I say it is sure to be made the paramount question, for no man can be aware of its encroachments and not clearly foresee it must become a question, not of temperance or prohibition, but a question between treason and loyalty, as it is already between Christ and Satan.

The lines are being formed now and they will stand out clearer after the November election than ever before, and I pity in advance those preachers and professors of Christ who will try in vain to explain how they came to fall away from the advance guard of reforms and true conservatism and became the apologists with the selfish partisanism that offered mint, anise and cummin and strained at gnats and built on wood, hay and stubble and neglected the weightier matters of the law, judgment and mercy and the all-controlling love of God.

Hitherto they may not have been total abstainers or prohibitionists, but how will they stand on the issue as it is now drawn?

Illinois State Jubilee Convention.

For a number of years the State Missionary Convention of Illinois met at Eureka with the State Encampment or Assembly. This year the Missionary Society celebrated its fiftieth anniversary and met with the church at Bloomington. This is a beautiful little city of 25,000 people and the Christian Church one of the largest and strongest in the whole brotherhood. They also have a large, beautiful house of worship which is well adapted to convention purposes. There are 1,200 members who are among the most generoushearted people we have ever met an i who seem to be ready for any great work that the Lord may commit to their trust. This, together with other reasons, made the Jubilee convention a great success.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions have the first day for its sessions. The sisters of this state were among the first to take hold of this work, and the good that has resulted to our Illinois churches in our conventions, the Christian cul ture, the spiritual conditions and the splendid organization and development of our sisters in this convention clearly indicate the great good that comes from this work. The reports were full of encouragement and showed a decided increase over the work of former years. Miss Anna M. Hales indicated by her report that she is making an efficient corresponding secretary. In fact all the officers of this work seem to be efficient and have that singleness of purpose that brings success to any great cause. Miss Lura V. Thompson, Carthage, so efficient as a national organizer, was presented, of course, and delivered an excellent address. We predict a rapid growth and enlargement in our woman's work in this state in the hands of these sisters. It would be unjust to close this part of our report without calling attention to the strong, eloquent address of Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, Lexington, Ky. It was elevating and inspiring and became a spiritual tonic to all who heard it.

On Wednesday morning we had the reports of the State Missionary Society. The report of the board was presented by the corresponding secretary, J. Fred Jones. This indicated that 43 had been employed for all or part of the time, 1,682 days' services had been rendered, 1,572 sermons preached, and as results there had been 1,110 baptisms, 586 others added, making 1,696 additions from all sources and six churches and Bibleschools organized. The treasurer, J. P. Darst, reported that $8,317 had been received from all sources for state missions, $1,756 of which was collected and expended in the city of Chicago. The treasurer also reported that they had $22,207 in their permanent State Mission fund. Mrs. Sarah A. Starr gave $10,000, Miss Elizabeth R. Dain gave $2,000, J. D. Metcalf gave $1,000, John V. Dee $1,000, Dr. G. W. Taylor 80 acres of land and other smaller amounts to this fund. Most of this fund was raised by N. S. Haynes while state secretary. Interest received this year was $1 280. These reports indicate a good work and the best of results. There are now 123,000 members in our Christian Church in the state and there is no state in the Union where the possibilities for the cause are greater or the promises more hopeful. The work of Bro. Jones is highly satisfactory to the brotherhood of the state and the good results indicate the cause of this appreciation of his work.

The addresses of the convention were all good and worthy of this Jubilee occasion. The address on Christian Journalism, by F. G. Tyrrell, Chicago, was highly commended. By the way, why not have more addresses on our religious literature at these great meetings? Our Christian journals have made it possible to have these gatherings to extend the cause of our Master and there is no greater need among the Disciples of Christ than a good religious journal in every home, and yet it is so often that these most self-sacrificing men who are trying to supply our homes with Christian literature are looked upon as mere book agents who are to be shunned. We need more of these addresses. The reports and addresses on Eureka College placed that institution in a very favorable light before the convention. The same was true of the Divinity House, Chicago. The work of the former was presented by Pres. Hieronymus, Miss Mary S. Hedrick and G. B. Van Arsdale; of the latter Dr. Willett and Errett Gates. J. E. Lynn, Springfield, N S. Haynes, L. Peters, Taylorville, made strong addresses on State Missions. Judge C. J. Scofield, president of the convention, captured the convention with his annual address. It was clear cut, logical and most opportune. On Wednesday night Dr. Willett spoke at the Coliseum to an immense audience. His ad dress was on the subject of "The Position of the Disciples: Its Centrality and Catholicity." He spoke one hour on the first point and twenty minutes on the second and third. To hold such an audience for an hour and twenty minutes in a city like Bloomington on a subject where the teaching of different denominations must be more or less contrasted, either expressed or implied, is in itself a great power. This Bro. Willett did to the satisfaction of all. His address was full of instruction, logical, scriptural and expressed in a most eloquent manner. This address will do great good and its influence will go far beyond the convention. The writer did not get to hear the address of W. W. Hopkins, of St. Louis, nor F. G. Tyrrell on the labor problem at the close of the convention, but learned since that these addresses were up to the high mark set by those that preceded them.

The next convention goes to Springfield with R. L. Thrapp, Pittsfield, president.

Col. Jonathan Merrian, Chicago, made a telling speech on the "Anti-Cigarette League." Many were aroused to the evils of this destructive

J. H. Gilliland and his great congregation seemed happiest when they could render most service to make others comfortable and happy.

Four charter members of the Missionary Society organized fifty years ago were still living, one of them, H. Y. Kellar, Effingham, was present at the convention.

W. E. M. Hackleman, aided by Prof. Easton, conducted the singing. This was done to the delight of all. A special Jubilee song had been composed and set to music, which was sung most beautifully by our Illinois brethren.

Judge Scofield as a presiding officer is a delight to a convention. His quick perception, his suave manner, logical mind, his legal knowledge, his universal kindness and dignified Christian bearing make him truly a favorite in the chair.

Taking the convention all in all, it was good and it was great and it has produced a lasting impression for the good of the Master's cause on many hearts. May the Lord bless the means inaugurated in the hands of the board during the G. A. HOFFMANN. year.

A COMMON TROUBLE

Thousands Suffer From it Without Knowing its Real Character

No trouble is more common or more misunderstood than nervous dyspepsia. People having it think their nerves are to blame, are surprised that they are not cured by nerve medicines and spring remedies; the real seat of mischief is lost sight of: the stomach is the organ to be looked after.

Nervous dyspeptics often do not have any pain whatever in the stomach, nor perhaps any of the usual symptoms of stomach weakness. Nervous dyspepsia shows itself not in the stomach so much as in nearly every other organ; in some cases the heart palpitates and is irregular: in others the kidneys are affected; in others, the bowels are troubled, with loss of flesh and appetite, with the accumulation of gas, sour risings and hear burn.

Mr. A. W. Sharper, of No 61 Prospect St., Indianapolis, Ind., writes as follows: "A motive of pure gratitude prompts me to write these few lines regarding the new valuable medicine, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I have been a sufferer from nervous dyspepsia for the last four years, have used various patent medicine and other remedies withou any favorable results. They sometimes give temporary relief until the effects of the medicine wore off. I at ribute this to my sedentary habits, being a booskeeper, with little physical exercise but I am glad to state that the tablets have overcome all these obstacles, for I have gained in flesh sleep better and am better in every way. The above is written, not for notoriety, but is based on actual Dedication at Eaton, Ind.

The congregation of Disciples at Eaton, Ind., is now more than sixty years old and is one of the live, progressive churches in our great state. It has entirely outgrown their old house of worship and have built them a new one.

Eaton is a live, progressive town of some 2,500 or 3,000 inhabitants. It is in the heart of the natural gas belt of Indiana. The new house just completed is the best house we have ever seen in a town no larger than Eaton. It is beautiful both on the outside and inside. We have never seen more beautiful frescoing. The cathedral glass windows, the seating capacity, carpeting, pulpit, furniture, etc., all beautifully blend with the walls and ceiling. The main auditorium is large, the pews are comfortable and massive. The lecture room, the Bible and infant class-rooms, the pastor's study, the library room, the vestibules, etc., are all most conveniently arranged. It has a baptistry, two robing rooms, is heated with a furnace, is well lighted, beautifully carpeted, has an organ and piano, a silver communion service, a good supply of singing books, etc.

By invitation we were present at its opening service, and preached the sermon, raised the money and dedicated the house. There was an indebtedness of $5,000 to provide for. We made an appeal for this amount. There were two responses of $500 each; then $150 and $125 and $100, and then in the $75, $50, $25, $10 and $5, until the amount reached $5,400, and then the great congregation arose and sang:

"All hail the power of Jesus name, Let angels prostrate fall; Bring forth the royal diadem And crown him Lord of all."

We have never witnessed greater rejoicing among any people than that which followed the dedication of this elegant and commodious house of worship.

Bro. J. A. Brown is the pastor of the church at Eaton, and was master of ceremonies. Bro. B. F. Aspy, one of Indiana's good preachers, lives in Eaton. His hospitable house was our home while we were there.

Bro. G. W. Thompson, of Union City, a veteran in the Lord's army and one who has preached the gospel for many years, attended the dedication. Eaton is the home of Bro. A. Younts, an old soldier of the cross, who has frequently and lovingly told the story of redeeming love to his neighbors. We will not soon forget our happy visit to this con-gregation of Disciples, nor the great kindness shown us by them.

With better facilities than ever before, may the church here go on to grander triumphs than ever before. L. L. CARPENTER.

Virginia State Convention.

The annual convention of the Virginia Christian Missionary Society will be held at Seventh St. Christian Church, Nov. 13, 14, 15 and 16, 1900. A program of rare excellence has been arranged and will be made public when all the details are completed.

The railroads have agreed upon a rate of a fare and a third for this occasion, and the brethren and sisters of Richmond and Manchester will cordially welcome the Virginia Disciples to their hearts and homes.

The indications are for an unusually pleasant and profitable state meeting. The preachers are urged to come, and influence as many others as possible.

Churches, Sunday-schools, societies and individuals will please not forget to come prepared to make liberal offerings for the ensuing year; and those who have made pledges that are unpaid will please arrange for the payment of the same between now and the convention, so that the new missionary year may be started with the Society in a good financial condition.

Bro. Shelburne has already entered upon his labors as Financial Agent, and has met with most gratifying success.

Hoping that our brethren and sisters will come in large numbers to give aid and inspiration to the work of extending the Master's kingdom in Virginia, and requesting the earnest prayers of the brotherhood for the Lord's richest blessing upon the work, fraternally,

University Place Sunday-school reached highwater mark at the rally last Sunday with an attendance of 1,047, which was 95 more than that of last rally day.

J. D Corbett at Knoxville next Sunday, and Allen Hickey the Sunday following.

On his way home from the Holy Land, I. N. McCash was taken with typhoid fever. He is in London; the latest cable message says he is getting well.

J. P. Rowlison held a meeting of three weeks at Pleasant Ridge, in Marlon County, closing Sunday aight. There were a number of conversions. Bro. Rowlison began a meeting Monday evening of this week at Englewood.

The writer of these notes was at Knoxville last Sunday. There were large audiences morning and evening. Good Sunday-school and Endeavor. H. D. McCoy and L. Covey, the elders, are earnest and active men.

There was a large attendance at the Marion County meeting which was held at Dallas last week, and there was much enthusiasm. B. S. Denny, W. B. Crewdson and J. H. Ragan, who were on the program, failed to attend, but Joel Brown, J. D. Ferrall and J. P. Rowlison were there. There were good papers and addresses. A county evangelizing board was appointed, of which James Watson is president and Miss Minnie Ritchle, secretary. There is yet much work to be done in Marion County, at Hamilton, Marysville, Bussey, Tracy and other towns.

If you don't feel quite well, try a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla. It is a wonderful tonic and invigorator. It will help you.

Twelfth District C. W. B. M.

The annual meeting of this district was held Friday, Sept. 28, in the beautiful little church at Tuxedo, district manager, Mrs. Emily L. Marshall, presiding, and was one of exceptional interest and profit. Spite of lowering skies, which finally sent down a veritable down-pour of rain, there was an unexpectedly large attendance. The morning devotional exercises were conducted by Tuxedo Auxiliary, and a carefully prepared paper on "Our New Fields," written by Mrs. Nannie E. Hopper, was read by a sister from Eilendale. "Our Responsibility to the Heathen World-Where Should it Rest?" a chalk talk and paper by Mrs. Merriman, was, in her absence, presented by Mrs. Harrison, and proved a good object lesson, showing not only where it should rest, but where it does, owing to a lack of understanding in relation to this same responsibility. The remainder of the morning session was devoted to reports, appointment of committees, etc.

The afternoon session opened with devotional exercises conducted by the Fifth Church Auxiliary and a very busy hour was spent in hearing and acting on reports of committees, financial reports, and plans for the work of the coming year. A touching little recitation, "Shepherding the Sheep," was beautifully rendered by Dr. Emma Gantz, the session closing with a "Congress on China," conducted by Mrs. J. D. Alexander, which consisted of "Its Maps," by Mrs.Wm. D. Harrison; "Its History," Mrs. L. G. Bantz; and "Its Religious Condition," Mrs. D. N. Gillette. These papers were of a high order and showed careful and thoughtful study of the subjects treated.

Officers elected for ensuing year: District Manager, Mrs. Emily L. Marshall; district secretary, Mrs. Wm. D. Harrison; district treasurer, Mrs. F. L. Gantz; district J. E. superintendent, Mrs. Harrison.

Reports to Sept. 14, (year ends Sept. 30), number of auxiliaries, 11; number of members 272; number of tidings 76. Total amount of collections $781.51; state work $77.10; J. E. $105.53. This district pays the salary of Miss Ottley, a teacher in India, and supports two India orphans.

First Day Oct. 1.— W. W. Shiff.

First M. My family and I have just returned m Lexington, O., the home and birthplace of Bro. L. Cook, State E angelist, where we assisted in a meeting. He and I had often prayed and need for this meeting while laboring together need for this meeting while laboring together evangelists in the West. I rented two tents i pitched them near the tabernacle, which was a beautiful grove. Hundreds of people heard the first time the plea of the Disciples of rist for "Christian Union." Bro. Cook preached only a true, devoted man of God can preach. As lain, practical teacher of the Word, there are y few who excel him. He left the old home 16 as ago a Congregational minister, a graduate Oberlin College, but returned with his whole consecrated to the preaching of the simple ry of Christ and the union of all Christians on Word. It was indeed a pleasure to be there drejoice with him and his loyal wif in the ranization of a body of Disciples numbering 101; by immersion, among which were many of his school-mates and loved ones. He will remain th them indefinitely. May God bless the work d workers everywhere.—Perry McPherson.

NEBRASKA.

Arapahoe, Oct. 1.—Since last report I have received two into the church; one by letter, the professor of the public school, and one by confession, making 27 in all during the past seven months at regular services. We are looking forward hopefully to a good meeting in November conducted by Evangelist T. A. Hedges. The people here speak in high praise of the Christian-Evangelist.—E. G. Merrill.

Evangelist M. Ingels begins a meeting at Pied-

Armourdate Church, Kaneas City, Uct. 1.—Une confession yesterday and one by letter a week ago yesterday. Three baptized last evening; 24 added during my work here.—T. L. NOBLITT.

Reserve, Oct. 4.—Bro. J. V. Coombs has just closed a very successful meeting for us at this place. He is very strong in the presentation of the gospel. His appeals stir the people. DeLoss Smith is an excellent leader of song. There were 30 additions in all. We are greatly rejoiced over the good results.—Melancthon Moore, Pastor.

Olathe, Oct. 1.—Three young ladies—two of them high school graduates—made the good content.

fession at our regular preaching service last evening. There were a young lady and gentleman who did the same two or three weeks before, making five confessions in the month of September. Our C. E. meetings are not easy to surpass in interest and helpfulness. The attendance has very largely increased in the past two months.— S. H. GIVLER.

Jacksonville, Sept. 29.—There have been seven additions since the 1st of August; three baptisms. No effort is spared by the whole church to do good and its light is shining in good works. Bro. Snively will do the preaching in a meeting in November, assisted by home forces. -A. C. ROACH, associate Emden, Oct. 1.—Six baptized by the writer at Mackinaw, near Antioch, last Lord's day. One of these expects to devote his life to the ministry.— J. I. JUDY.

Crisp, Sept. 30.—I began a meeting at the Boley church in Wayne County, Sept. 9, under the auspi-ces of the district board. I found a few scattered Disciples who had not met for over two years After three weeks' hard work, both personal and pulpit, we have them renewed spiritually, and also added three to their number; two by baptism. We go from here to Union Star and begin a meeting to-night.—L. D. Hill. Eureka, Sept. 1.—Our new church shuilding at Cazenovia was dedicated to the service of the Lord, Sept. 9th, and all indebtedness cleared up. Followed dedication with a three weeks' meeting, rollowed dedication with a three weeks' meeting, which resulted in 17 accessions, and the church greatly strengthened. Bro. Thos. J. Shivey, of Valparaiso, In J., conducted and preached dedicatory day and was with us through a part of the protracted effort, assisted by Bro. J. W. Kilborn, of Washburn.—B. L. WRAY, minister.

IOWA.

Corning, Sept. 30.—We began work here last Sunday. Bro. Crewdson left this field in fine shape. They know how to make a preacher and his family feel at home. We took an offering for sufferers in Galveston and sent it to Bro. B. L. Smith. The amount was over $6. Hope to attend the convention at Kansas City.—I. H. FULLER.

Earlham, Sept. 29.—I am in a meeting at Early Chapel (North River Church) in Iowa, with good prospects. The church at home (Altamont, Mo.) is undergoing reconstruction; that is, I mean a new house of worship on the old foundation, with an addition of 18x30 feet on North side.—M. L. ANTHONY AND L. O. ROUTH.

Ottumwa, Oct. 2 — Last Lord's day evening we were rejoiced on account of three more taking up the work with us here; two by statement and one the work with us here; two by statement and one from the M. E.'s by confession and beptism. Last Tuesday we paid off our church debt and are happy.—D. F. SELLARDS.

Des Moines, Oct. 2.—The church at Blackton, rejoices over seven accessions to the Church, September 30. This makes 12 accessions in the past two weeks at our regular services. Each member has pledged themselves to try to bring one soul to the Master during the coming year. This is our way of doing the Master's work and doubling our membership. May our Master bless our efforts to the end that we may see the fruition of our

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the sys-

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and t roat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another. but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in the stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordidary charcoal tablets."

Hamburg, Oct. 1.—I returned from the meeting at Iowa Falls, Sept. 18. There were 19 additions in four weeks. Bro. W. F. McCormick is an able preacher and loving pastor. I shall never forget my labors with him in the Master's vineyard. Clark Braden preached for us here a week ago last night. Three baptisms last Monday. Yesterday was a good day; large audiences at both morning and evening services. We organized a Y. P. S. C. E. in the afternoon. Sister Bessie Osborne is the corresponding secretary. A convention of the churches of Fremont County was held in Hamburg last Tuesday and Wednesday. Bro. J. H. Wright, of Shenandoah, preached the convention sermon. It rained both days of the convention and the attendance was not large, but we succeeded in organizing to do more thorough county work. The county board gave a good report of work done in the past. Elder John Hank-ins informed us that he would leave Tabor soon and enter the field to evangelize. Bro. W. W. Hallam has just closed a meeting at Bartlett, with 16 additions. I go to Audubon, Nov 18, to hold a meeting with Bro. Bro. J. H. McSparrow, the pastor.—H. W. CIES.

MISSOURI.

Canton.—Some of the young preachers of Christian University held meetings during the last summer vacation and brought 300 into the Church. -D. R. Dungan.

—D. R. DUNGAN.

Kirksville, Oct. 5.—We had eight additions to the church here last Sunday. Baptized four last night at prayer-meeting.—H. A. NORTHCUTT.

Columbia, Oct. 2.—Four young ladies added to the Mount Pleasant Church, Howard county, by obedience, last Lord's day.—W. S. Sr. Clair.

Canton, Sept. 30.—Closed a three weeks' meeting at Concord, Shelby county, Sept. 23, with 17 additions. It is a field white unto the harvest.— E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Bowling Green, Oct. 2.—Have just closed a two weeks' meeting at Hopke Church, a mission point in Pike county, resulting in 13 additions and a new organization. I am now in the midst of an interesting meeting with the church at Olney.—
S. WALLACE MARR.

La Grarge.—My time is engaged until Jan. 1.
After that Prof. V. E. Ridenour will be associated with me as singer and assistant.—I. A. HEDGES.
Columbia. Oct. 2.—Bro. B. F. G. elin, of Hinton recently closed an excellent meeting of two weeks

People. It met with an enth

as we improved it from time with his church at Perche, resulting in six confessions, a number restored and the chur h greatly revived. When Bro. Goslin took charge of the Perche Church last May they had an attendance of about 50, which has since increased to from 400 to 500. It is to be hoped that this may become one of Boone county's most useful churches under Bro. Goslin's miristry.—W. S. Sr. CLAIR.

Aurora, Oct. 1.—We had a great day yesterday. It was our fall rally day; 400 present at the Bibleschool. Combined the two morning services and preached a sermon to the children. Everybody seemed to be happy and much interest manifested. At the night service our house was full of earnest hearers. Two additions by primary obedience, one reclaimed and one by letter. Have had 23 additions in my first four months here at the regular services. We praise God and press on.—M. J. NICOSON.

Joplin, Oct. 4.—During September we received six additions—five by letter and one by statement. Work is in progress on our new church building. About 125 delegates attended the Jasper county convention at Lakeside Park, Oct. 2.—W. F. TURNER.

Jasper, Oct. 3.—Glad to report the Jasper Church entirely free from debt. A few days' canvass raised $400 and canceled the mortgage. Annual meeting last Sunday. Encouraging reports from all departments of the work. Membership increased 33 per cent at regular services.
Only one half time work.—M. S. Johnson.

Holden, Oct. 1.—Bro. R. L. McHatton, of California, is assisting me in a meeting at Kingsville. Crowded house and one confession last night. Meeting one week old. His address until the National Convention will be Kingsville, Mo. J. W BOULTON.

Shell City, Oct. 1.—Yesterday was red letter day with the church here—13 additions at the morning service, three at night. Just closed a meeting at Prairie View Church, Johnson county, with three by confession and baptism. STERLING.

Huntsville, Oct. 1.—Three additions yesterday, two by letter and one confession. Large congregations. House repaired and beautified until we now have the handsomest interior in the city. Repairs cost us nearly $800, and almost $500 of this raised by our two enterprising Aid Societies. Took offering for Church Extension. Have given over $300 to missions since January and expended nearly $2,000 on ourselves. Missions foster growth. All efforts for saloon defeated so far. Hope to keep them out permanently.-Louis S. CUPP.

Savanab, Oct. 1.—The 13th semi annual convention of the Y. P. S. C. E., of Andrew county, met with us Sept 29.30. The attendance from abroad was not large, but the sessions were enthusiastic and instructive throughout. The Junior rally Sunday afternoon was a great success. Our home societies won the banners, both Junior and Senior, and we are justly proud. One confeasion Sunday night.—A. R. HUNT.

KENTUCKY.

Paducah, Oct. 1.—Four additions at 10th Street Church yesterday. Additions on nearly every Lord's day; 10 during September. Galveston brethren remembered.—I. H. Teel.

A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume,

"Shem' is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylouian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the relation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CTS.

One In Christ.

MRS. P. R. GIBSON.

To-day the wide, wide world around
Re-echoes this triumphant song,
That "Christ is King" in him is found
The victory over sin and wrong.

Glad greetings come, from North lands sent, And from far Southern vale and wood; While Orient and Occident Clasp hands in loving brotherhood.

O'er valleys low and mountains high, The Sun of Righteousness shines forth. That angel song from vaulted sky, Is still the song of "Peace on earth."

Speed the glad day when in accord All hearts shall join the sweet refrain, And own allegiance to our Lord, Who shall, as King, forever reign. It. Louis, Mo.

Mary Ann's Success.

MINNIE E. HADLEY.

'Waal, mother, I don't see what better we be then the man es caught the baar—can't hold on an' we're afeerd to let go."

Josiah Green hitched his chair nervously he spoke, and sent rattling onto the pty bottom of a large tin pan a tremend-volley of the white corn grains which he is busily shelling for meal.

'Four years o' college edgycation fur lry Ann," he continued, making the vigorstrokes of a cob, which he used for a aller upon the large, snowy ear of corn, lp time with his words, "hes meant that hard strugglin' an' close pinchin' us, an' it's only made her sort o' droopin' mopy like. What's she a wantin' money now, mother?"

Mrs. Green set her iron down with a ng and hurriedly brushed away two or tee warm tears which she had just let fall on the laundered front of Mary Ann's nite shirtwaist.

The spirit of gloom and discontent which med to pervade their humble little houseld since Mary Ann's return from college d been felt by no one more keenly nor fered more intensely than by this weary, er-burdened mother, who was willing to crifice her very life-blood for the sake of r daughter's happiness, and had almost ne so, only to find that the coveted college ucation had rendered them all miserable d unhappy.

"It's her writin', father," answered Mrs. een, cheerily, hastily choking back the eat lump that was rising in her throat.
"She thinks she hes a kind o' knack fur't, d all of her teachers hev told her so; but e poor child's nothin' here to think on th only chickens an' cows an' makin' rden an' such. All her writin' comes ck quick es she kin git it off, and that's hat keeps her continu'lly upsot. I've been inkin', Josiah, we've got ter manage somew to send her to the city fur a spell."

This last sentence had been a hard one to utter. Between the cravings of her daughter's literary ambition on the one hand, and her husband's embarrassment on the other, poor Mrs. Green's position was a trying one, and all the more so from the fact that her "thinks," "guesses" and "believes" were sure to settle all family questions of a financial character.

"Well, mother, it's jest es you say, o' course. I reckon I kin sell a couple o' them yearlin' calves, an' then there's the brood o' fat turkeys comin' on, an' the crop o' wheat; but it clean spiles my new suit o' clothes an' the plasterin' o' the upstairs bed-rooms, an' fur the life o' me, mother, I can't see why Mary Ann's head haint full ter overflowin' with idees. Why she's got all this busy growin' and hummin' o' old Dame Nater right under her nose—the twitter o' birds an' the hum o' bees, the big yeller field o' wavin' grain an' the tall green trees noddin' in the woods-what could she find more inspirin' ter write about? I could most make a book on't myself."

"I believe it, deary," answered Mrs. Green, in a somewhat lighter mood, for she always experienced an inner sense of pride in these poetic outbursts of soul on the part of her uneducated husband.

"You allus hev hed a knack, Josiah, fur seein' beauty where nobody else could," she went on, thinking no doubt of her own plain face, "but Mary Ann's different. All these things that air bright an' stimulatin' fur you only gives her a spell o' the horrors. I guess she'd better go."

A week later found Mary Ann safely lodged in a little third story, six by-eight room of a flat in a respectable quarter of one of our large western cities.

She was a bright young girl with real literary ability, and in no way lacking in appreciation for the great sacrifice which her poor, hard-working parents had made in order that she might enjoy this supposed advantage.

"I must work night and day," she thought.
"I must establish my reputation, and then all this hard earned money will be paid back a thousandfold."

So she sat at the little low stand in the dark, cheerless room, oftentimes all day long, with only a run into the parks in the evening or a ride into the heart of the city for the sake of new ideas.

Finally she mustered up courage to run the gauntlet of rebuffs, which was the only "open sesame" into some of the editor's sanctums. But it was always the same old story: "I am very sorry, but the MS. is not available;" or, "Plenty of such material on hand just now," etc.

Oh, how weary were those days of constant writing, copying and waiting, only to be met at last ever and always by rebuffs and discouragements!

There were gleams of hope now and then, to be sure. Lots of the editors spoke encouragingly and every such little remark was unduly elaborated when she wrote home to the anxious father and mother.

"I must be brave," she thought. "They shall only know the bright side of things."

Evidently she had given the folks at home the impression that her work was prospering, for soon the little skimped allowances quit coming altogether. Winter was coming on and Mary Ann had scarcely enough to eat. Still she persevered, sitting bent over her little stand all day long, oftentimes hungry and cold while the storms were howling on the outside.

But one snowy morning the end came. Mary Ann found herself too weak to rise from her bed. A great thumping in her left lung was sending sharp pains through her chest, and she was burning up with fever.

"I've been afraid of this," said the kindhearted landlady, as she peeped into the room. "You've overtaxed your strength, my dear, and we must always suffer for such things, you know."

"You must go home at once, my dear," said the wise, gray-haired_doctor a little later, as he bent over her with a pair of kindly-beaming eyes, which seemed to interpret her whole story at a glance. "You are seriously threatened with pneumonia, and the pure, fresh air of the country, together with a mother's tender care, is all that can ever make you well. Want of care and this illy ventilated room means death for you in a very short time. I must get you off to-night, if possible."

The sentence came upon her like a thunder-bolt. To return home sick, penniless, discouraged, and live among chickens, cows and coarse people—or else to die in that little room! Which did she choose? For a moment she chose the latter.

"I can't go, doctor," she answered, determinedly. "I must fight it through right where I am. You don't know what a horror I have of country life. Go away and let me die where I am."

The wise old doctor chuckled knowingly, and began stroking her forehead.

"Have you read anything of Miss Burney's, my dear?" he quietly asked.

Miss Burney! The great novelist and literary star, whose name was in everybody's mouth?

Of course Mary Ann had read scores of her charming short stories and had ardently longed to be like her.

"I shall send Miss Burney to talk with you, my dear. She can convince you better than I, for she has been through just such an experience."

It was a quiet, sweet faced little woman that entered Mary Ann's chamber a few hours later. Her hair was streaked with grey, and there had been lines of suffering upon her pale face, which were now almost obliterated by a halo of Christian loveli-

"I am so glad the doctor sent me to you," she said sweetly, as she grasped Mary Ana's feverish hand with her soft, white one, and placed the other lovingly upon the burning forehead. "I've been through it all, you see, and I mean to help you. This same doctor was called to my bedside fifteen years ago, and under the very same circumstances. The unfinished MS. lying upon your stand proves that you have true literary ability, but you are dealing with a subject you know little of, just as I commenced to do at your age. Remember, dear, that luxurious city life and complex sociological questions are being dealt with every day by hundreds of brilliant minds with all the advantages arising from age and experience. Go home to your parents; seek your own happiness in administering to theirs, and open up your soul and heart to the simple beauty of the life about you. If you are a true artist nothing will appear entirely stale and profitless to you, for everything that God has made reveals some simple, homely truth or poetic beauty. Simple, rustic life is teeming with a richness of beauty that is yet unwritten. Study it, my dear, with a pure, Christian-like devotion; learn to love its simple, hard-working people, for among them you find many of God's highest and noblest creatures. Whenever your soul is thoroughly awakened to all this, my dear, then you can write, for then you will have something to write about with which you are thoroughly familiar and with which your heart is full.

"Don't be above the homely tasks that your mother does. When you see her tired and weary, lend a helping hand in His name and God will glorify the act. A little housekeeping well done will render your literary work all the more enjoyable and give you the exercise so essential to the physical health of all students. Take my advice, and in a few years from now you may be able to come to the city with an established reputation and enough means to keep you comfortably. I have been through it all, and only found my true literary self in the quiet surroundings of my old country home after a long spell of sickness, resulting from a fruitless attempt to gain distinction in the city. Go; work, study, love and pray, and may God's blessing go with you."

A warm tear fell upon Mary Ann's cheek, as this great and good woman stooped to kiss her good bye, and into the young girl's heart there stole a quiet peace and happiness which she had not known for years.

"And always remember this, my dear," added the quiet, little woman, as she left the room, "remember, it is not where you are, but what you are that counts in life."

When spring came again it found quite a different atmosphere in the little rural home of Josiah Green, since Mary Ann was now happyand contented; for she had given herself to the happiness of others and every day revealed some new beauty or joyful experience, heretofore undreamed of.

The coveted success came at last and was inspired in a peculiar and unexpected man-

She used to despise the sight of her father's old, broad-brimmed, shabby white hat, but now as she looked with a heart full of love and tenderness upon the old familiar object and thought of the faithful service which it had rendered, and of the beautiful spirit of sacrifice which prompted her father to wear it, her heart was filled to overflowing, and that inspiration gave to the world a little poem, "My Father's Old Hat." It was full of passion and beauty, for she had sung from her heart and the heart of the world vibrated in response.

"Waal, I never!" exclaimed Josiah when he had learned of his daughter's growing fame. "I allus knowed Mary Ann could find plenty o' idees fur writin' up, on the old f arm, in trees an' flowers an' sich, but who'd a ever dreamed o' her a-findin' 'em in my old white hat?"

Open-Mindedness.

C. H. WETHERBE.

I believe that it is of the utmost importance that one should constantly maintain an open mindedness in respect to all truth. He who is so unfortunate as to believe that the doctrines which he has been entertaining are precisely correct, and hence that he will not give them up for others, is sure to hinder himself from making such advancement in the discovery of new truth as he would make if he were thoroughly openminded. It is well for one to have positive convictions in regard to various principles, truths, doctrines and practices. Unless one does have such convictions he is so indifferent and weak a man as to be a mere puppet, a little intellectual wind-mill. But one may have most decided convictions respecting certain things, and at the same time be eagerly ready to welcome anything which is true and wholesome, even though it may clash with the views which he has long cherished. I may be permitted to state that

The Heavenly Railroad.

J. T. HOBSON

In the onward march of human progress the railroad has reached the Holy Land. A train runs from Joppa to Jerusalem, a distance of fifty four miles, in three hours, and the fare is $3.

I have traveled much by railroad in the last few years at two-thirds and one-half fare rates, and have heard the names of the stations called again and again where I was to stop. On the platforms of stations, I have so often met those who were there to greet and welcome me.

I have often thought I should like to visit the Holy Land and take a trip on the train from Joppa to Jerusalem, and at the end of my journey hear the call, "Jerusalem!" Then leave the train and behold the place where my Savior toiled, suffered, arose, and ascended to glory. But if I never take that trip I feel that I am on the heavenly railroad. I was unable to pay the full price of my fare, but it has been kindly paid by a Friend. There are a few incidental expenses by the way that I cheerfully and gladly pay. I need no accident policy, for this train never wrecks. I do not know the distance I am to travel, nor how long it will take, but no matter, the journey is pleasant, and I am happy on the way. I expect to arrive on schedule time in the city of the New Jeru-salem to meet that dear Friend and many loved ones gone before.

"Oh, how sweet it will be
In that beautiful land,
So free from all sorrow and pain;
With songs on our lips,
And with harps in our hands,
To meet one another again."

SUBJECT: Do.

Text: "Whatsoever men do unto you do ye also unto them likewise." Matt. 7:12.

My brethren, Jesus understood human nature. He gives us some good advice and if we heed his advice we will be a success. Notice how people treat you and you treat them the same. If your neighbor treats you well, you treat him well. If he helps you in time of trouble, you help him in time of trouble. Your neighbors are those who are good to you; you should be good to them. This will require self-sacrifice on your part, but the grace of God will enable you to conquer.

But if a man is mean to you and tries to injure you in any way, you must be mean enough to him to make him quit. Have him understand that it will not pay to treat you badly and then he will become your friend. As the Lord says in another place, "If your enemy smite you on one cheek you smite him on the other."

Finally, brethren, you must not trust any one until you find him out. Treat everybody as rogues until you find them out differently, because that's the way they will do you.

Obey the Scriptures. Do others as they do you.

III .- Linda May Discovers a Dog.

When Linda May went home from her visit to Madge, her Aunt Dollie looked at the clock to see if she had not been gone over an hour. But she hadn't; and Aunt Dollie frowned sternly at the clock as if she thought it had not done its duty. You see, Miss Dollie was a good lady and she had a kind heart, and she would nurse you when you were sick, and she always sent flowers to your funeral; but she didn't waste much kindness on just live, well people. thought that what children liked to do was mostly what wouldn't be good for them. As soon as her little niece had seated herself in her favorite chair under the mantelpiece, Miss Dollie said: "Where did that straw come from?"

The straw lay in full view on the carpet, and it had fallen off Linda May's dress. "You have been up in Mrs. Morris's loft," continued Miss Dollie, "and you have been jumping." Linda May wondered how her aunt knew that, She looked at the straw to see if it had any way of telling, but the straw just lay there like any other straw. It was hollow, and Linda May wished she had some lemonade to suck up it. She hastened to explain that she had forgotten Miss Dollie's views on jumping, and she had stopped just as soon as she remembered. Miss Dollie rose with a stern face. "Did you turn somersaults?" she asked firmly.

"Not one, Aunt Dollie, not one."

Miss Dollie hesitated, and stood looking at the girl as if she had half a mind to help her turn one right there. At last she said: "Linda May, do you think you will remember, after this, not to jump?"

"Oh, yes, Aunt Dollie, I know I will!"

Miss Dollie sat down stiffly. "You are very trying, Linda May!" she sighed, and began to sew. You see she wanted to raise Linda May right, but she didn't know how. The child was a great trouble to her. Miss Dollie often told her so.

Now, this is the reason Linda May had taken her seat under the mantelpiece. On the shelf was her private box, filled with little odds and ends, and Linda May wanted to get down the box, and leave it out in the yard that very night, to see if she would find some candy in it the next morning. Miss Dollie never liked for the girl to play with her box, because the odds and ends were sure to get all over the carpet. It was funny how they scattered about as sure as you opened the lid. It looked like they must have legs and crawl. Linda May stood up and rummaged about the shelf. Miss Dollie stood this for some time. At last she said: "Linda May, what are you looking for?"

"Just my box," was the reply, as she took it down.

"Now you are going to scatter those things," said Miss Dollie.

"No, Aunt Dollie, I am going to take out all my things and put them on the mantel, and just have my box empty."

"Why do you want your box empty, Linda

May?"
"I don't want anything in it, Aunt Dollie." This was not a very clear explanation, but it seemed to satisfy the old lady and she went on sewing. Linda May emptied the box, and took it out on the porch. As soon as she went out, she saw that strange young man, Mr. Edgar Brown, coming along the sidewalk. Now Miss Dollie didn't have any fence around her yard; the smooth plat of blue-grass, always carefully trimmed by the lawn-mewer, ran down even to the edge of the sidewalk. When Edgar saw Linda May, he smiled and decided he would stop awhile and talk to her. So he started across the grass-plat, going catercornered, you understand, instead of coming up the front walk. All of a sudden a voice hailed him with these words: "Young man, I don't allow anybody to walk on my blue grass!"

It was not Linda May who spoke these words, but Miss Dollie, who now appeared at the door. Edgar grew red and confused. "Madam, I beg your pardon, I am sure,

"But come off of it," interrupted Miss Dollie, sharply. "I don't want you to ask my pardon, I want you to come off of it." Edgar hastened to gain the sidewalk. "There is my front walk, sir, that is for you," she went on, just as if she had had it built for his benefit. "State your business, please. I am a busy woman." Miss Dollie didn't want to get acquainted with any more people than she knew already.

"No business, madam," he answered, as cheerfully as he could. "I meant to say good-evening to Linda May, and I had some peanuts I thought she might like."

"It is kind of you, sir," said Miss Dollie, as if she thought it wasn't, "but I can't endure peanuts. The hulls get all over my carpet, and if you eat them in the yard, what kind of a looking yard do you have? There is no place here to eat peanuts." Brown walked away. "Come on in the house, Linda May," said her aunt. "And bring that old empty cigar-box with you. This is no place for boxes. If you stay out here, I will have my blue-grass all trampled to death. I put in all spring keeping boys away from my cherry-tree, my one poor little cherry-tree; and I must work till snowtime keeping my blue-grass rid of men with peanuts! Come in, Linda May!"

Linda May went in, but she thought it very hard that she had to stay in the house on account of people with peanuts. She wanted the peanuts, too. She would have liked to have cried a little, but that was one of the privileges Miss Dollie did not allow. I must say I think Miss Dollie was right there. Let us give her her due. Linda May got a book to read-it was "Under the Lilacs," and there was a dog in it that could do tricks. Oh, how Linda May wished she had a dog! She began to wonder if she couldn't get one, somehow, and keep it some-

THE LOST SHEEP AND LOST COIN.*

While Jesus, in the parable of the Great Supper, rebuked the Jewish leaders for not accepting the gospel, yet he would have no one rashly folow him. The life to which he invited men was too serious and arduous to be begun without most earnest and intelligent purpose. Hence, he told the multitudes that they should count the toost, before proclaiming themselves his disciples, lest they meet with the fate of the builder who was unable to complete his house, or the genaled who went against the foe with an utterly inadequate force, to meet certain defeat. Many asse of backs'iding might have been prevented by a little thoughtful instruction to the new and enthusiastic convert.

Amid these helpful lessons which the Master rave so freely to the people, the Pharisees and cribes wer: watching jealously for some occasion f gratifying their animosity, and one soon preented itself. "All the publicans and sinners vere drawing near unto him for to hear him. And oth the Pharisees and the scribes murmured, sayng, this man receiveth sinners and eateth with hem." It was a disgraceful act, in their eyes, or a rabbi to eat with these Roman tax collecors, the oppressors of the chosen people, and with he social outcasts whom they called "sinners." They forgot that the physician must go among he diseased, the redeemer must seek for the lost. o Jesus uttered the three parables of grace which have served for ages to reflect the divine olicitude and love in the largest measure possible o human language. The first two of these form ur present lesson.

The purpose of these parables was to show how eaven was interested in the salvation of sinful nen, and how, therefore, this was the highest ampition that could animate the souls of those who professed to be children of God. Alas for earth! when the Son of God must go as far as heaven for sympathy in his work of grace. Men rejoice over he recovery of a sheep or a coin, but despise a uman soul, rescued from an evil world and retored to the bosom of the Father! The Phariees said: "There is joy before God when those who provoke him perish from the world." Jesus aid: "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." They nade men better than God. He showed that God was infinite in mercy.

- 1. The shepherd missed the one lost sheep. Chough all the others were safe in the fold, his watchful eye detected the absence of but one. If there were but one sinner on earth, the Good Shepherd would have known that his flock was not complete. He knoweth his sheep and calleth them by name.
- 2. He cared for the one lost sheep. Ninety and nine did not satisfy him, while the hundredth was wandering upon the cold mountains. Can he mean, as has been suggested, that the angels are the ninety and nine and we mortals the one that strayed away? If so, he left all the shining hosts n the blue heavens afar, to seek the wandering sheep-man on the wide moorland of earth. "He took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham." He followed the ost one and sought earnestly till he found it. There is no other explanation of the incarnation and atonement than that given by the apostle to the Gentiles. "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." The shepherd would not make his wearisome way over the mountains, through the desert, with bruised and bleeding feet, except that his sheep is lost and he would fain find it and take it home again. No other explanation can be given of those three and thirty years of sacrifice and suffering by the Son of God than that he sought for a lost world, and would not leave over the search until he had found it. Have we ever yet entered into the spirit of his yearning and patient seeking for the lost? If so, we will never become impatient, and give over our efforts, so long as life lasts.

3. When he found the lost sheep, the shepherd did not rebuke or chastise it, but laid it on his shoulders and brought it home rejoicing. He saved not with a grudging spirit, but a glad one. This was the joy of the Savior's life. He forgot fatigue and hunger in the delight of leading souls back to the Father's house. When, at the well of Jacob, he restored a poor, sinful woman to faith in God and love of holiness, he exulted in spirit until he could not eat the food his disciples had brought him. Why is it that we are able to restore so few of the wanderers from God? Is it because we meet them with frowns and stripes, instead of smiles and tears? Is it because we too often withhold the welcome clasp of the hand and wait to see if they will "hold out?" Not such was the welcome sinners received from our Savior. Not so did he receive us, when we, who "were as sheep going astray," had "returned to the shepherd and bishop of our souls."

After picturing the joy of the shepherd, who calls in his neighbors to share in his good fortune, Jesus declares what must have amazed his hearers and given a deadly shock to all their religious prejudices. "I say unto you, that even so there shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine righteous persons, which need no repentance." Without arguing with them as to their claims of superior righteousness, he for the moment grants their claims and thereby exalts the joy of heaven over the salvation of sinners. And how true to human experience is this declaration. Never is anything valued so highly as when we have lost it. Health is lightly esteemed, until we are sick. Wealth is seen in its true character, as a means for noble living, only when we have lost it and think how we might have used it better than we did. Friends seem more precious after they have departed. When the lost child is found, there is more joy over it than over many who were safe at home, simply because it was lost and they were not.

"There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth," said the Master, at the close of the second parable, that of the lost coin. Who is it that rejoices in the presence of the angels? Manifestly, it is the Father himself, whose erring children have come home. And this joy is imparted to the hearts of the heavenly host, and they, too, catch up the strain and sing the song of redemption. They do not wait till we enter the gate of glory, but the moment a single sinner steps within the gate of grace the Father says, there is another of my dear children turning his steps hitherward, and from his face, radiant with holy delight, the angelic faces are illumined with a light never seen on sea or land. O, that the Church on earth might enter into this joy more fully and sing her jubilee songs when sinners turn to the Lord.

One added suggestion in the parable of the lost coin seems to deserve a word or two. Its lesson is intended, doubtless, to be the same as the former one, and we are not disposed to repeat the subtle and fanciful distinctions that have been drawn between these two simple and beautiful stories of the Master, which were uttered with a single supreme purpose. But in the graphic tale of the poor woman, searching her humble home for the coin she had lost, we are told that she lighted the lamp to guide her in her search. If we are to find lost souls, we must have the aid of the lamp God supplies in his holy Word. It will be a lamp to our feet and a light to our path. An intelligent, prayerful use of the word of God will make us skilful in following the wanderer o'er his devious path and enable us to direct his steps safely home when we have found him. "Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness: that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work."

OUR STEWARDSHIP.

Recently a man who has been very successful in business in one of our great cities and has amassed a considerable fortune, was told by a lady friend that all he had was only loaned to him for a time in trust, that it was not his and he would be held responsible for its use. He grew very angry-although the lady was a close friend and had spoken half jestingly-and with cursing he declared that he had made his money himself, it was his own, and he'd do what he pleased with it; then he took his hat and stormed out of the house.

This is the attitude of many. It was the attitude of the man who pulled down his barns to build greater wherein to "bestow all my goods." Whose are all the things, and ideas, and people in this world? Do they belong to men?

Some of us are entrusted with great accumulations of things-houses, lands, animals, pebbles of gold or silver.

Some of us have given into our care great wealth of ideas, gained in one way and anothera possession even more real than things. Some have people in their power-workmen, scholars, messengers, shop-girls.

But all of us in one way or another have charge of some realm-great or small-of stewardship. And, by the way, who is to judge what is great, and what is small, whether the realm is important or unimportant, whether it is of twelve cities or two?

In this parable our Lord states the principle that responsibility is in proportion to endowment. It is the old story of the talents and of the light upon a bushel.

Some try to deny the equation that responsibility equals endowment. Some men of great power and great possession seem to insist, by their conduct, that responsibility is in inverse ratio to endowment. But they can never unbalance the scale that God has set.

The test "my neighbors all do thus and so," breaks down as a justification for conduct before the rule of Christ, "that servant which knew his . . . nor did according to his Lord's will . will, shall be beaten with many stripes, but he that knew not, and did things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." The responsibility is according to the knowledge of right and wrong. "To him that knoweth to do well and doeth it not, to him it is sin."

Once more, this principle makes each man the arbiter in the sight of God for his own conduct. What we really possess is known to none except ourselves and God. None, therefore, can judge of the extent of our responsibility save these two -God and ourselves. Let each man examine himself.

There is a source of pleasure in the thought that he who is endowed with little and makes great use of it is worthy of greater reward-and will receive it-than he who possesses much and makes an equivalent use of it. Is there not joy in taking limited resources and making them go a long way? Not he that has much, but he that makes much out of what he has! Thank heaven for this principle!

Obituaries.

EMBERSON.

Mrs. Agnes M. Emberson was born near St. Joseph, Mo., April 2, 1870; died in Columbia, Mo., Sept. 15, 1900, aged 30 years, 5 months and 13 days. She first came to Columbia in 1882, with her mother, Mrs. Elliott, for the purpose of attending school. It was there that she first met her husband, R. H. Emberson, to whom she was married June 11, 1888. When quite young she joined the Methodist Courch, but after her marriage she joined the Christian Church. The first three years joined the Christian Church. The first three years of her married life were spent at Higginsvilla, Mo., the next four at Marshall and the last five at Columbia. At the time of her death she was the only living child of the family. She leaves two little girls, Lucy aged 11, and Agnes 6, a husband and a mother to mourn her loss. Her death occurred on the eleventh bir hday of her oldest child. She faced death calmly and peacefully. She talked to her husband about her death and requested to be buried in Columbia. She talked about her chil-dren and the last faint whisper that fell from her lips, but could not be understood, was something about her baby, Agnes. She had an unshaken faith in God, the Father, and His dear Son Jesus, the Christ. She lived for the church, her children and her home. She fought a good fight and has gone to receive a crown of righteousness.

HER HUSBAND.

HOLLADAY.

James Madison Holladay was born in Missouri, Dec. 21 1847, moved with his parents to Kanaas at the age of seven, became a member of the Christian Church at twenty. Married Kate Moore Nov. 14, 1878; to them were born eight children. All except the younger ones are devoted members of the church. The family, including Sallie, Mr. H's sister, were members of the Round Prairie church, Kansas, until they came with letters to cast their lot with the colony people in Scott Co., Ark., Dec. 14, 1898. Six years' service as deacon, thirteen years as chorister and much labor with the young people in Suntay school, missionary and Christian Endeavor work had endeared him to the cause and prepared him for useful work among us. He was never behind in meeting his part of the expense of the brotherhood. As a son, he supported an aged father and mother, sisters found with him a home and trusted him as a counselor. He was devoted to his family and did all in his power to provide for their physical and spiritual wants. A few brief days of illness, the summons was answered. A good man has gone.

Judge J. C. Lee was born Jan. 31, 1829, died Sept. 14, 1900. Bro. Lee was one of Howard County's cldest citizens. He was reared to manhood on the farm, and educated in the public schools. During the war Judge Lee served in the Confederate army and made a brave and true soldier. He was presiding Judge of Howari County for eight years. In all his life there is no better example of the safe and conservative citizen, the brave soldier and devoted Christian; marked by a generous Southern hospitality that ever made his home a welcome guest chamber for his many frlends. Bro. Lee was a consecrated member of the Christian Church for 50 years, and for over 30 years was one of its honored deacons.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Christian Science is abroad in the land, seeking whom it may devour. It is the most stupendous fraud of the Nineteenth Century, yet so shrewd are its advocates, and so thoughtless is the average man and woman, that tens of thousands have been deceived.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE DISSECTED

is an antidote for Christian Science. It is a book by A. D. Sector, which tells what Christian Science is, in the plainest of language. Mrs. Eddy is shown to be a conscious fraud and a conscienceless charlatan and pretender. The book contains 62 pages, neatly printed and bound.

Book Notes.

Once again-for the time is growing short-we call the attention of our readers to our "Biographical and Historical Library." We have sold a large number of sets of these books, and we expect to receive orders for many more before November 1, when the offer will be withdrawn. Remember that for FIVE DOLLARS we offer the following ten volumes, all bound in cloth, new, in first-class condition:

Life of Alexander Campbell. Life of Benjamin Franklin. Life of "Raccoon" John Smith. Life of Jeremiah Black. Life of Elijah Goodwin. Life of Knowles Shaw. Life of J. K. Rogers. Life of Jas. A. Garfield. Life of Berty Stover. Dawn of the Reformation in Missouri.

At regular retail, catalogue prices, volumes would cost $16.00. We are offering the set for less than one-third the regular price. This offer will positively expire November 1.

Another great book offer is our "Home Library," advertised in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of last week. For FIVE DOLLARS we are offering Fifteen Splendid Volumes as follows: Fiery Trials. The Man in the Book. Wondrous Works of Christ. Life of Gen. W. T. Sherman. Thirteen. Prison Life in Dixie. Christian Missions. A Knight Templar Abroad. Nehushtan. My Good Poems. A Book of Gems.

Duke Christopher. Bartholet Milon. Up Hill.

Know Thyself.

The books in the "Home Library," purchased singly at catalogue prices, would cost $17.30. Our price for the set, until November 1, is Five Dollars. One of the books-"Thirteen"-is in paper covers; the other fourteen are cloth-bound volumes, aggregating about 4,500 pages. Such an offer as this was never made before.

"Shem," by J. Breckenridge Ellis, is a great book. It is a story of Judea six centuries before Christ. Among the characters that figure in the book are the Prophet Jeremiah and King Zedekiah. By the subtle skill of the author the reader is taken back across the centuries until he breathes the soft air of Palestine, and seems to gaze, with his own eyes, on the scenes and incidents which form the story. 'Shem" is a volume of 299 pages. The price is but Fifty Cents.

"Christian Science Dissected" grows in popularity. It is a powerful antidote to the fallacious doctrines of the Eddyites. The low price of this book-twenty-five cents-makes it available for use as a tract. If you have a friend or acquaintance who has fallen under the spell of Christian Science, send him a copy of this book. It will open his eyes and show him the folly and falsity of the preposterous claims of Mrs. Eddy and her followers. Or if you wish an entertaining evening, read "Christian Science Dissected" yourself. The price is but Twenty-five Cents.

Let our preachers remember that we sell the best baptismal pants made, and that our price is considerably less than that advertised by other

Pike County (III.) Meeting.

The annual meeting of the Pike County Christian Co-operation was held at Pittsfield on Wednesday, Aug. 29. It was the best meeting in all respects ever held in this county. Pike County has twentyone Christian Churches. Several of them are in a fight most of the time on the organ and similar questions. It has been demonstrated to me by actual contact with the anti element that most of their time is spent in denouncing the efforts of their brethren for missionary, Sunday-school work, etc. In almost every case, so far as my observation goes, an anti church is either dead or dying.

We thank the Lord that most of our churches in this county, however, are moving along, doing the Lord's work for their own community and for "the regions beyond."

Elder N. E. Cory, of Barry, preached a sermon during our rally, and addresses were made by J. Fred Jones, our state secretary, G. L. Wharton and Elder Veach, of Mt. Sterling, besides addresses by local speakers.

G. L. Wharton moved all hearts. At the close of an afternoon ta'k on the famine in India, without a hint from him an offering was taken of $45 for famine relief. The Foreign Society should keep Bro. Wharton in the field continually.

Pledges were made amounting to $130 for county work. This will be increased.

The ladies of the Pittsfield church served dinner and supper to 600 people.

The preachers of the county present were W. E. Spicer, C. B. Dabney, N. E. Cory, E. A. Dolbeare and R. F. Thrapp.

Every county in the state should have an annual rally in some central location. Each church should have a church rally. It helps the work to a wonderful degree by reviving the sleepy members.

The writer spoke at the rally of the Chapin church Aug. 30. A large company were in attendance. RUSSELL F. THRAPP.

Facts About Critics.

While looking over an accumulation of nearly 300 periodicals I read with deep sorrow of the departure of Bro. Alex. Procter and others of our faithful men in the ministry. I was once in the home of Bro. Procter and will never forget the sermon he preached to me on "the Transfiguration," while pointing to the many beautiful flowers in his garden. Bro. Procter was a critic, but a just one. He was unlike some of our brethren, who use such severe criticism on the "Passion Play," something that they were afraid of seeing on account of its sacredness, acted out by men and women whose life and character may be below the line of perfection. How do these critics know that the Lord's day may be desecrated by seeing the sacred story acted out? What do they personally know about the Oberammergau peasant? Have they any idea about the originality of the wonderful play? What would they think, if they should see an audience almost spellbound for about four hours in the forenoon and four and a half hours in the afternoon? I saw men and women to my right and left who were literally dead to the gospel of Christ; but seeing the acts of Judas, Peter's betrayal and the cruci fixion, these people shed tears. Whether these people repented or not I do not know, but that scene is upon their mind forever. From the thousands of Americans that have attended the play I have heard no complaint whatever. We saw tourists in Constantinople, Athens, Naples and Rome who never saw the Passion Play, but "heard" all about it and therefore knew, consequently they would not go to see the sacred story repeated. What a conscientious trouble! They had no trouble about attending theaters and other worldly amusements. The person who rejects apparent evil in one way and indulges in hidden sin in another reminds me very much of the good house-wife who cleaned off all the cobwebs but failed to kill the spider. The critic should be positive and not depend on others for information, when he has an opportunity to see and hear. Truth half told will never kill the spider. This article is not written to find fault with the Christian critic; but to differ with those who depend on justice without knowledge. I am afraid that too many critics are like Bro. Updike's illustration of the "little self-appointed lords over God's heritage who have heads about the size of a man's fist, screwed on the end of their backbones to keep them from raveling out." JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

All Day Sunday

SHE THOUGHT ABOUT A FOOD THAT WOULD AGREE WITH HER.

An unnatural appetite for rich and improper food is really kept alive by the use of such foods, whereas a change to healthful, nourishing and scientifically made food will correct the unnatural appetite. A little woman up at Peckskill, N. Y., Margaret Smith, P. O. Box 193, says:

"I was such a sufferer from dyspepsia that life was a burden. I could hardly keep from esting all sorts of pastry, cakes and other rich foods, although they did not agree with me, nor in fact did any sort of food. I become low-spirited and discouraged, was too weak to work and very seriously troubled with palpitation of the heart.

"Drugs seemed to make me worse rather than better. A friend said one day: 'I believe Grape-Nuts food would cure you,' explaining that that food was made with great care and intended for the prevention and relief of diseases that were brought about by improper food.

"That was Saturday night, and all day Sunday I kept thinking about Grape Nuts, and the first thing Monday morning I sent for a package. I had it in my mind that the food would look like nuts and was disappointed when I found it had to be eaten with a spoon. However, I followed the directions and made a meal of Grape Nuts and milk, which I found delicious, and for the first time in months, I suffered no distress after eating.

"I at once began to feel hopeful that I might be cured at last. Since that day I have used Grape-Nuts constantly, morning and night, and have steadily improved in health, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life; weigh 10 pounds more than I did a year ago, have no more palpitation of the heart and can work all day long.

"At supper I have Grape-Nuts mixed with softboiled eggs. I make my dinner on any kind of food I desire. One of the best things about this cure by proper food is that I no longer have any desire for the rich, indigestible rubbish of which I used to be so fond.'

CURRENT EVENTS.

As the political campaign progresses the interest in the struggle of the contending parties increases, but the chief battle-ground is yet most largely confined to political party newspapers. The people are not going wild about their party platforms and candidates as at times in the past. The different speakers in each of the leading parties are generally having a large hearing, but the people seem disposed thus far to be more considerate than usual and it is to be hoped that they will continue in this frame of mind until the election is over. At a few points the "rowdy" spirit has come to the surface in connection with prominent speakers of the two leading parties and a few partisan papers have tried to make political capital out of the occurrences, but the people generally understand that these demonstrations are neither provoked nor upheld by either political party. Any political party seeking the support of a free people must stand for good order and free speech first, last and always. Another commendable feature of the campaign thus far is that it has been remarkably free from personalities and it is to be hoped that this feature may not be changed to the end of the battle. Let it be known that "mudthrowing" is a reproach to any man or party and a thing to be condemned by all good people and this kind of warfare in a political campaign will become a thing of the past. Keep the discussion upon the high plane of education and no demoralizing effects will be felt as the direct result of the campaign.

While it is to be hoped that the crisis in China is past yet this cannot be assured. The tension in many places has been greatly relaxed, but friction still exists and a serious entanglement is not yet an improbability. The disposition of the powers toward China is somewhat modified, though not toward those who are responsible for the Boxer uprising. Field Marshal Count Von Waldersee will soon reach Pekin, but he expects to return to Tien-Tsin soon and may winter in Shanghai. The rebellion in Southern China continues to be threatening in its character and may yet assume alarming proportions. Prince Ching has been endeavoring to improve conditions in Pekin by calling upon the different legations in royal Oriental style. It is said that at some of the legations he was not very cordially received and the duration of his call was greatly shortened thereby. Some of the powers are still strongly opposed to a partition of China and while they believe that China should pay heavily for the injuries which have beer sustained by the Christian nations they are not in favor of taking it out in Chinese territory. It is thought by some that the questions involved will be settled at The Hague or in Washington, D. C., by an international commission. This method of settlement would reflect great credit upon the powers involved and be a grand victory for the doctrine of international arbitration.

Notwithstanding the extremity to which the Boer generals have been reduced in their resistance to British rule in the Transvaal they continue to harass the British army at different point. Just what they hope to gain by this method of warfare is not apparent, but they seem determined to carry their resistance to the last ditch and Gen. De Wet has issued a proclamation recently in which he declares that all burghers who refuse to fight will be made prisoners of war. But Gen. DeWet's proclamations and method of warfare do not seem to be standing in the way of British plans in the Transvaal. Sir Alfred Milner is proceeding with his plan of civil government under English Rule, and the reported shipment of two and a half millions in gold from the Transvaal to the United States would indicate that gold mining in that country is again under large headway. That the gold is coming to the United States instead of going to England is attributed to the large shipments of cotton from our shores. inflow of gold to our country will of course be unobjectionable to our financial centers. Such an event is generally heralded as a favorable omen by our financial prophets. But if English rule in the Transvaal brings to the people of South Africa no greater boon than the reopening of its rich gold and diamond mines its great struggle for South African supremacy will not be of enduring results. We hope, however, that the greater liberties and higher civilization of which so much was said, apologetically, during the late war with the Boers may be fully realized in the near future.

The ninety-first annual session of the American Board of Missions was opened in the Pilgrim Congregational Church, this city, on last Wednesday. Missionaries from all parts of the world were present. Some of these were from China and gave accounts of the uprising of the Boxers and the dangers to which missionaries in China were subjected, and even suffered. The address of welcome was delivered by Dr. Burnham, pastor of Pilgrim Congregational Church, and responded to by Samuel P. Capen, of Boston, president of the board. When

Mr. Capen referred to St. Louis as "a town almost as large as his own" there was a smile on the audience and when the figures of the late census were shown to Mr. Capen at the close of his address he was somewhat surprised. This shows how hard it is for an eastern man to realize that there is anything great west of the Allegheny mountains. In the report of the Home department. Dr. Daniels stated that ten corporate members had died during the course of the year. Forty missionaries have been sent out during the year, eleven of whom were men and twenty-nine women. Whether this is due to a greater demand for women than for men in the foreign field, or whether the women are showing more faith, courage and interest in the foreign work, is not stated. In financial matters the treasurer of the board, Mr. Wiggen, reports a total income of $737,957.95, of which $564,763.95 were donations and $100,000 legacies. The balance, legacies applied to debt and interest on permanent fund. It must be remembered that this sum includes the women's work of the Congregational Church. The reports from the various foreign fields in the main show that considerable progress has been made in the growth of missions and mission work. In China the work has met with much opposition and many reverses. The annual missionary sermon of the session was preached by Rev. E. C. Moore, of Providence, R. I., and was listened to with marked attention. It was a sermon of hope and calculated to increase hope in the minds of his hearers. The sessions are of special interest. to all who are interested in missionary work in the foreign field.

The wonderful feats of the battleship Oregon placed the United States in the lead for the construction of these mighty engines of war. But the splendid record of this great war-ship for speed has been excelled by another war ship of more recent construction. The Wisconsin, which has just been completed and made her trial trip and which is one thousand tons heavier than the Oregon, maintained a speed of 17.25 knots per hour for four hours, being one and a quarter knots more than the contract required. In a spurt a speed of 18.5 knots per hour was attained. The highest speed ever reached by the Oregon was 17.15 knots per hour. The Wisconsin has yet to be tried for endurance in long runs such as the Oregon has made in her famous history, but there is every reason for believing that in this respect the Wisconsin will not be a whit behind. After her trial for speed she was turned over to Admiral Kantz and staff for maneuver trials.

FORWARD!

This issue of the Christian-Evangelist will reach our readers in the midst of our great annual convocation. If we were to try to sum up in one word what we think the risen Christ would say to us in this Convention, and to all the churches which it represents, we should use the one word we have placed at the head of this article-FORWARD. There is no question but that we have made some considerable progress in carrying out the work which, in the providence of God, we have been called to do. But we have reached no resting place. We have not yet apprehended that for which we have been apprehended by Christ. The only thing for a man, or a movement, to do that is engaged in an unfinished task, is to press forward in the direction of its accomplishment.

There is need that we press forward in our study of the Scriptures, and in our understanding of what the will of the Lord is. Free and unfettered by human creeds as we have been and are, we have made no little progress in coming to an intelligent understanding of the great purposes of God in revelation, and in the methods and contents of that revelation. It would be a fatal mistake, however, to suppose that we have learned all that the Holy Scriptures are designed to teach us or that we have satisfactorily solved all the problems which it raises. We must continue, therefore, to press forward with eager minds and open hearts, ready to receive all the truth that God has placed within our reach, whether in revelation, in history, or in nature, that will help us to do the work which He has given us to do.

Especially do we need to press forward in our efforts to do the will of God as we understand it. Here is perhaps the greatest lack. If we could only bring achievement up to our ideals of right and duty, the kingdom of God would be advanced much more rapidly than at present. It would profit us little to have a clearer knowledge of God's will than many others, if this superiority of knowledge does not produce in us higher types of manhood and womanhood, nobler illustrations of self-sacrifice, and greater achievements in Christian service. Jesus began "both to teach and to do." This must be our method of procedure if we are to be worthy disciples of Him whose name we wear. The doing must keep pace with the teaching, or else the world will have reason to doubt our sincerity.

We must go forward in Christian attainment. There is one thing higher than doing, and that is being. The being is in order to the doing. There is nothing higher in this world, nor in the next, so far as we are able to know, than to be a Christian. That means to be Christ-like. Here is room for infinite progress—in the consecration of our energies and powers to the doing of God's will, in purity of character, in unselfish service to our fellow men, in cheerful submission to our inevitable lot in life; in a word, to reincarnate Jesus Christ in our lives. There is no sense in which we can go forward to greater advantage in extending Christ's reign among men than in the personal exemplification of that reign in our lives.

We need to go forward continually in religious enterprise, in the use of every wise method and device by which we can bring the truth of God to bear upon the world. Perhaps we have not been as fruitful in devising methods for doing good, and for extending the knowledge of those principles which we hold to be so important, as we should have been, in view of the freedom which we have in Christ Jesus. Whatever false view on this subject may have hindered our operations in the past has been outgrown, very largely, and we ought to be in condition by this time to avail ourselves of every method, not violative of the principles of the gospel, which promises greater efficiency in disseminating it among men. There is much yet to be done in the way of effective organization in order to reach all our churches with the teaching and the religious care which they need to build them up into real churches of Jesus Christ, so that they shall be radiating centers both of the knowledge and of the life of God. Let us never conclude that we have exhausted all our efforts in religious statesmanship so long as so large a proportion of our churches and membership is not enlisted in active co-operative work for the extension of the kingdom of God.

Finally, brethren, let us go forward in humility, advancing on our knees. Let us go forward in reverence, recognizing Christ's presence with us. Let us go forward in faith, hesitating at no obstacle; in hope, rejoicing in ultimate success; in love, counting it a joy to endure and suffer for Christ's sake. Blessed be His name forever and ever!

Children's Rally Day for America will be what the preachers and superintendents make it. If the children have the facts presented to them concerning the field with the same unction and clearness with which the foreign field has been presented they will take equal pains to aid in taking America for Christ. Already letters have come to the Home office indicating a widespread interest in the revival of the day.

IN CONVENTION ASSEMBLED.

At this writing the great annual convocation of the Disciples of Christ is in c nvention in the Hill City at the mouth of the Kaw, known as Kansas City. Our annual national convention is trinitarian, that is to say, it is three in one. It is the fifty-first annual convention of the American Christian Missionary Society, the twenty-sixth convention of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. These conventions are not made up of different individuals, but mainly of the same constituency acting through three separate national organizations.

The first in order to hold its sessions is the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. It was feared when this order was first etablished that the brethren and even many of the sisters would wait until after Sunday, and hence until after this organ zation had finished its business, before coming; but this fear has proved to be like many others, unfounded. It is more and more the custom for the delegates who attend the convention at all to be on the ground at the beginning of the sessions of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. This year is no excep tion to the rule. A large representation was present at the social on Thurs lay evening, at which the welcome was extended by Mrs. F. M. Lowe, and a response was made by Mrs. Helen E. Moses, corresponding secretary of the C. W. B. M. Some of the foreign missionaries were introduced and made very brief addresses, giving the larger part of the evening to the exchange of We notice delegates social greetings. present from the Pacific Coast, from the Atlantic sea-board, from the Gulf States and from the far North. The assembly is truly national in character.

The conventions are being held in Armory Hall, which is capable of seating about three thousand people. It is too small by about half for the accommodation of such a convention, and over flow meetings at night are necessary to accommodate the people. The Convention Hall, had we succeeded in securing it, would probably have been as much too large as the present one is to) small. Even in the present hall it is very difficult for the ladies to be heard, and with some of them it is impossible. It seems to be necessary that our sisters should cultivate a voice of greater carrying power in or ler to be effective speakers in our national conventions. This is the more desirable since their addresses in spirit, in thought and in literary excellence are so well worthy of being heard.

We have already seen and heard enough to feel safe in saying that the Kansas City Convention is a success, not only in attendance but in results achieved and in plans for the future. The weather has been all that could be desired. It is the glorious Indian Summer weather, than which there is no season of the year more beautiful. The Kansas City brethren have been well organized into committees to look after the various wants of the convention, and they re carrying out their duties with great delity and, so far as we can hear, to the attresatisfaction of the people from abroad. ansas City is extending its fame as a connention city by the spirit of hospitality hich it is manifesting, and by the marked aprovement in its streets and public buildings and street-car facilities within the last aw years. Our Kansas City correspondent his breezy letter has not over-stated the tractions of the place.

We have not space here to report in etail the various addresses and reports on he program of the Christian Woman's oard of Missions. 'It was a matter of ratification that Mrs. O. A. Burgess, ersident of the society, was able to be resent, though her address was read by Irs. A. M. Atkinson. She has found it ecessary also to call to her assistance a umber of the women to preside at different imes during the convention. It is a great omfort, however, to all the sisters that she able to be present and give her wise ounsel in the management of the convenion. Some of the aldresses delivered have een as follows: On "Young People's Vork," Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, of Ohio; The Mission and Ministry of Orphanage Work," by Mrs. A. K. Thurgood, of Pennsylania, read by Miss Adelaide Gail Frost; 'The Chinese of the Pacific Coast," by Mrs. A. C. Smither, of California; "The Mountain People," by Errett McDiarmid, of Kentucky; "School of Methods" was conducted by Miss Mary Alice Lyons, of Ohio; an address entitled "My Individual Responsibility," was given by Mrs. Mary Wisdom Grant, of Missouri; and a poem by Mrs. M. C. Healey, of Michigan, was read by Mrs. Louise

The Friday evening session was occupied by an address on "The Cost of Success," by Mrs. Carey E. Morgan, of Virginia, read by Miss Anna Hale, of Illinois; and another on "How Will we Pay it?" by Mrs. Effic Cunningham, of Indiana.

Saturday was taken up chiefly, both forenoon and afternoon, with the reports of the various committees, although there were addresses by Miss Mary Graybiel, of India, on "The Extension of the Work in that Country," and on "Our Bible School Work," by Robert Hopkins. In the afternoon Miss Annette Newcomer, of Iowa, conducted the "School of Methods," and Mrs. Jennie Harlan, of New York, delivered an address on the results of the year's work and the leading ideas of the convention.

Both on Friday and on Saturday mornings Barris A. Jenkins, of New York, introduced the sessions of the day by a Bible study. The first address was on "The Parable of the Sower," and the second on "Paul's Address on Mars Hill." These addresses were largely attended and highly appreciated. The reports of the committees were well prepared and were received with but little discussion. The addresses were all of them good, and some of them excellent.

The report of the treasurer shows:

Balance on hand Oct. 1, 1899......$ 29,620 54 Actual receipts for the year.......... 106,722 76

| General fund returned | 7,517 100 | |
|-----------------------|--------------|----|
| Total | $143.961 | 69 |

Balance in bank......$ 17,836 62

This, we believe, is the best year's work in the history of the organization, and every department of the work seems to be in a healthy, growing condition. The organization has from the first been managed with great wisdom, and its record of growing power and usefulness is one for which we all have reason to be thankful.

Perhaps the most important action of the present convention has been the agreement to accept the work of Negro Evangelization, which has hitherto been carried on under the auspices of the American Christian Missionary Society. It is characteristic of the whole history and spirit of this organization that it should be willing to take a work like this, so worthy, so urgent in its demands, and yet one which has never taken hold on the popular mind among us as it should, and carry it on to success. For many reasons it was felt that the women's organization was better adapted for this work, and that it would receive greater sympathy and support under their auspices than anywhere else. We predict that it will receive not less but more support from the brethren because of its supervision by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Every added responsibility which these Christian women assume magnifies the value of their organization and endears it to the hearts of the brotherhood.

SUNDAY AT THE CONVENTION.

The Lord's day was one of those glorious October days which puts any one with a reverent spirit in a worshipful mood. The pulpits of the city were placed at the disposal of our committee on pulpit supply, an I were occupied by our ministers morning Perhaps there is no one and evening. feature of our National Convention that brings us into so close touch with the people of the various religious bodies as the Lord's day pulpit supply, when our leading men by the score occupy the leading pulpits, and give their conception of the gospel to thousands of earnest listeners who would otherwise never hear us, and who, without such opportunity, would forever hold an erroneous view concerning our teaching.

The union communion service, too, has become one of the striking and impressive features of our National Convention. This ordinance is always impressive when properly observed, but when multitudes of believers from all parts of the country sit down together to remember their Lord and to come into closer touch with Him, and with each other, there is an added significance and impressiveness in the occasion. Not only was Armory Hall filled with the great number that gathered to join in this tender memorial service, but the First Church and that on Forest Avenue and Sixteenth Street were utilized also for the same purpose. It is impossible to describe the emotions which fill the heart during these silent and impressive moments when all hearts are flowing together toward one central object, and the consciousness of unity with Him and with each other becomes the dominating thought. Lord's day was a great day for Kansas City, and long will it be remembered by those who were permitted to share its spiritual joys and privileges, and to feel the inspiration that comes from such fellowship.

During the remaining days of the Convention we are to have a rich feast of spiritual things, of some of which we hope to tell our readers in our next issue. Minneapolis, Buffalo, Pittsburg and San Francisco. we understand, are pressing their claims as a place for the next convention. It remains to be seen which one of these will be successful.

WILLING SERVICE.

(2 Cor. 8:11, 12; Exodus 35:5; 36:5, 7.)
(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Oct. 24.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: The will is commander-in-chief of our faculties, and without its free consent no acceptable service can be rendered to God or man.

The Bible lays great stress on the human will. Having created man in his own image, giving him the power to choose his own course and destiny, God respects man's volition. The Bible proposes no plan to save men against their will, but its methods all look to the gaining of man's free consent and willingness to accept the salvation offered and to render the service required.

The Corinthian church had been solicited for an offering to supply the necessities of the poor saints in Judea. They had manifested a "readiness to will," at the time of the solicitation, and now, in the passage above cited, Paul urges them to "complete the doing also." And then he lays down a general principle which can be universally applied to all our Christian obligations: "For if the readiness is there it is acceptable according as a man hath, not according as he hath not." What God requires of us is a willing, oredient spirit, and after this such an obedience as lies within our power. If one has the willing mind, and then renders the best service in his power, "It is acceptable according as a man hath, not according as he hath not." There were in the church at Corinth members who could give but a very small mite for the relief of the distress of others. It would be a great consolation to them to know that God did not require of them impossibilities, and so the apostle added that word of comfort for them which would be also a stimulus to others who possessed more abundantly of the world's goods.

Whatever superiority we may claim for Christianity over the religion of the Hebrews which preceded it, it must be confessed that in one respect the disciples of Moses put to shame even the disciples of Jesus. In one of the passages cited above, when Moses desired an offering for the building of a tabernacle he said, "This is the thing which the Lord commanded saying, Take ye from among you an offering unto the Lord: Whosoever is of a willing heart let him bring it, the Lord's offering; gold, and silver, and brass." Only those who were "of a willing heart" were asked to make the offering. What was the response of these people, who, but recently, had been slaves in Egypt? The next passage tells us: "And they spake unto Moses saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, which the Lord commanded to make. And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman] (make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing. For the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much."

When has it happened that, in building a house for the local church, or in lifting a contribution to assisty needy churches in building houses, or in taking an offering for any missionary or benevolent enterprise, the people have had to be restrained from giving more? We are constrained to believe that one of the great hindrances to the progress of the gospel is the lack of Christian liberality; and this in turn grows out of the failure to recognize, even as the Jews seemed to recognize, that we are in partnership with God, and that our substance, which is the result of his blessing, should be held subject to the demands of his cause.

It is said, so netimes, ithat an announcement that an offering will be taken at a stated time in the future is sufficient to keep many people away from the meeting. Where is "the readiness to will" and the "willingness of heart" in such cases? Where is there any appreciation of the blessedness of Christian giving where members complain when they are called upon to share in the gifts made to supply the world's needs? A frequent objection to our paper is that it conveys to its readers these calls for help from various fields and for various purposes.

But it is not merely in the matter of giving money that we are to show our willingness to render, service, but in our response to every duty that is laid upon us. The members of any church may be divided into two classes:-those who render willing service in any way they can, and those who either shirk their duty and their part of the work, or who do it grudgingly. Some volunteer gladly to teach in the Sunday-school, or to render some lowlier service, while others refuse, because it would interfere with their ease or personal enjoyment. Let us not be deceived, however. If we have the spirit of Christ, then are we willing to serve anywhere where we may be called and where we can do anything for the cause of our Master, and if we have not the spirit of Christ, then we are none of his.

PRAYER.

O Lord, Thou Son of God, who didst willingly lay down thy life for the world's redemption, we do thank Thee that Thou hast called us into fellowship with Thyself to work with Thee in saving our fellowmen. Inspire us, we beseech Thee, with that same spirit of willing self-sacrifice which enabled Thee to bear the criss for us, that we, also, may be willing to take up our cross daily and follow Thee in all paths of lowly service, rejoicing in the privilege of showing our love for Thee in the service we render to others. For Thy name's sake. Amen!

HEROES AND HEROES.*

BY W. T. MOORE.

CANTO IV.

THE PHYSICAL AND THE MORAL.

I sing no fleehy, Trojan, martial strain,
Like Homer, with his bloody heroes slain;
Or Virgil, in a somewhat calmer mood,
Still telling of a cruel age and rude;
Or Scott, whose heroes lived in modern times,
Whose victories were pealed from church tower chimes.

Nor does Achilles wake my slumb'ring lyre,
Though his brave deeds set Homer's heart on fire,
Sweeping his soul with ardent, burning strains,
As when a fire flames through dry, grassy plains.
My song shall tell of better, higher things,
Its inspiration is the King of kings,
Whose Gospel banner, everywhere unfurled,
Will bring sweet rest to this sad, sin-cursed world.
My heroes all are heroes of the cross,
Those who have truly counted all things loss,
That they m'ght win and know the Christ of God;
Though all must pass beneath the chast'ning rod.

BIRTH, STRUGGLES AND GROWTH.

Just twenty-five great years have passed away, Since this Society's proud natal day. Much has been done since then to send the light To dissipate the gloom of heathen night, To help, where'er the Gospel message goes, The desert wild to blossom as the rose What was the task when first our work began? What aim had we? and what our working plan? Our task: the alien world for Christ to take; Our aim: from lost and ruined souls to make A new world saved, and full of hope and love, A reflex picture of our home above; Our plan: to work in every lawful way, No matter what our foes may think or say, We felt no method could be far from right That helps lost souls to see and feel the light; While any method must be sadly wrong, That keeps the world in darkness very long. With these broad views we launched our little boat, Not knowing whither it by chance might float; But trusting fully in the guiding hand Of him who gave to us the great command, To preach the Gospel to the whole lost world; We then and there our noble flag unfurled; And now it waves o'er many heathen lands, Placed there by trusted, consecrated hands.

At first the opposition cried aloud,
Hoping thereby to win the thoughtless crowd.
"The Lord's plan" was their constant battle cry,
By this, they said, they'd surely live and die.
But soon 'twas seen their reas'ning would not do,
Their strict construction made their plan untrue;
But worse than all, or anything yet heard,
Their plan did sadly mutilate God's word.
And thus a curious paradox arose,
In which took refuge all our bitter foes.
That famous paradox, when told in brief,
Was that a mission plan to bring relief,
Must follow scripture strictly, and not shirk,
Although at war with truth, and will not work.

This strange device, when fairly understood, Made baneful evil out of seeming good, And stamped the plea, for narrow Christian thought, Too fine for use and much too dearly bought. This fact is plain to all who wisely think, And also forms a strange, suggestive link In that great chain which binds us to the plan, Which aims to save wherever fallen man Is found, no matter what his state may be, At home, abroad, on land, or on the sea. Whate'er the Great Commission else may teach It surely does suggest a wider reach Than that which maims and cuts the first part off, And leaves the latter half for men to scoff.

*Written for the 25th anniversary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, held in Kansas City, October the 17th, 1900. We must not, then, in mean and selfish pride,
To help our cause, the precious truth divide;
What God has joined in one we must not part,
No matter what the cost or deep the smart.
In any case, it surely can not be,
A Gospel, which is grandly good for me,
Must be restrained by cold and selfish hands,
From visiting and blessing other lands.
The very thought is more than mean indeed,
And quite unworthy any Christian's creed;
It surely makes the high come down much lower,
And leaves the little less than 'twas before.

CANTO VII.

THE BLIGHTING CURSE OF SECTARIANISM.

Some other men play hide and seek with truth;
The Bible they have studied from their youth,
But through sectarian glasses always look;
And thus with eyes askance they see the Book;
Or else they carry to its sacred page
The color of their creed, the eye to gauge.
And in such cases we may well believe,
The color makes it easy to deceive.
These men see only what is in their eyes,
What disagrees with this, th y soon despise.
They search the Holy Book that they may find
A text just suited to their biased mind;
A text as firm as adamantine rocks,
One that will prove their doctrines orthodox.
This found, they then are ready for debate,
Though this is not to help investigate,
That truth may hold an undisputed sway,
Respecting all the questions of the day,
But solely in the intrests of a creed,
A sort of hungry, selfish kind of greed,
As when we strive both day and night for pelf,
In order that it may be used for self;
Or much like nations, in their wars for gain,
When land acquired is counted, not the slain.

Tis sad that faith, so noble in its kind, Should measured be by such a cast of mind, As that which makes our fellowship depend On partial views of truth which will not blend With all the revelation God has made, In which the Christian's faith is firmly laid. No views can be regarded safe or sound, Which do not meet and cover all the ground Of our great need, or of Redemption's plan, By which God seeks to find and rescue man. Hence bigots all must surely come to naught, They stand opposed to every gen'rous thought. This attitude not long can hold an honored place, Already it is falling in disgrace.

The union cry, by which all hearts are stirred, Can not be longer hushed, it must be heard; Its echoes now are ringing round the world, Wherever freedom's banner is unfurled.

On wings of prayer the cry to heav'n's begun, That all God's faithful children may be one; This is the spirit of the present age, Its glory and its noblest heritage.

Faith is no longer soulless doctrines cast
Within the creedal mould of ages past;
Nor yet some theologic testing rod,
With which to find when men are right with God;
But rests on him whose sympathetic heart
Goes to all men that he may life impart,
And makes his peaceful, pers'nal reign within
The human soul, the antidote for sin.
And thus our faith hath its foundation sure,
For Christ, our Rock, must evermore endure.
All temp'ral things will surely pass away,
But He's the same each past and present day,
And then forever; and this precious truth
Has been our stay and comfort from our youth.
And'this makes Faith a warm and living thing,
Connects the soul with Christ, our loving King,
And fills our lives with active, earnest deeds,
Instead of cold and lifeless human creeds.

CANTO X.

HEROES OF THE CROSS.

Our heroes in the foreign mission work
Have not in any way shown mind to shirk,
Wherever there has been a cross to bear;
And many days with them have not been fair.
They've had their trials and their burdens, too,
But these, with loving souls supremely true,
Cut loose their energy, as heat expands
And loosens steel, made into strongest bands.
The odds against them often have been strong,
But as their foes fought on the side of wrong,
No lasting triumphs could their efforts yield;

The right will surely win on every field, Where battle rages 'neath the watchful eye Of him who hears his children when they cry.

Some workers have been gathered to their rest, And each of these is now a welcome guest, And honored at our loving Bridegroom's feast; While al are from their toil and care released. Of two of these a loving word I'd speak, To tell how those who are in body weak. Can face all foes without the slightest fear, If only they can know that Christ is near, To give his strength and lend his gracious aid, According to the promise which he made. To his disciples, when at last he gave. To them the Great Commission which should save A lost and ruined world, and bring sweet peace, So that all discords might forever cease. I speak of these two souls become right well. I knew their inner life, and so can tell. Just how, away from all the world's applause, They sa rificed and suffered for that cause. Which we, in these great missionary days. Regard as worthy of the highest praise.

Returning to their own, dear native land, They sought in vain for health. The King's command.

To put their armor off and enter into rest, Close followed their arrival in the West.

DARKNESS AND LIGHT.

'Twa: darkness when these noble lives went down Behind our Western hills. They gained a crown, But some of us remain to mourn their loss. For, after all, 'tis true, the gold and dross Are mixed together in our earthly life, Like notes of peace in sad refrains of strife. But why should any one bereft now grieve? Can we not comfort find if we believe In him who took death's sting away and gave To all his own a viet'ry o'er the grave? This seems quite plain when said in reason's ear, But to the heart the message is not clear; What reason says, when from our friends we part, Is not the real language of the heart; We read the message whi h should bring relief, Then weep our souls away in bitter grief. This proves our reason never does control The tender, deep affections of the soul. When death comes in our willing spirits seek For comfort; but 'tis then the flesh is weak. We see the promise with cold reason's eye, And yet our hearts keep up their bitter cry. We sorrow not as those who have no hope, But sorrow still as in the dark we grope. Our heads point out the way that leads to light, Our hearts sink back within the shades of night,
'Tis thus two forces hold us from our birth, One pulls t'ward heav'n, the other binds to earth. The reason this is so, we may efine, Is that we are both human and divine. Our human nature makes us sigh and weep, We sow in tears but in mu'h joy we'll reap; For some day we shall reach that happy shore, Where things divine shall bless us evermore.

The two great souls to whom I have referred, Passed into Paradise, and neither feared To take the step, so full of trust were they;
And now from their bright, heavily home to-day,
They send a message both to you and me, Which is that Christ can only sot us free By making each of us his real slave; For only by such service can be save. is the way these women dear both served, And by this very se vice they were nerved To fight the London fogs, and smile at death, And sing Christ's praise with their expiring breath. Their names I dare not try to speak aloud, Yet by their deeds we are with strength endowed. There are still other names among our dead, Of whom a kindly word co.ld here be said; But this must be the work of some dear hands Who knew these heroes while in foreign lands; For only such can tell the matchless worth Of these brave workers as they lived on earth. Their memory is dear to us to-day; We can not always know the winding way By which we rise to mountains of delight; But may't not be, e'en through the darkest night, Those souls, who o'er us still their vigils keep, Will cheer and help us as we climb each steep, Until the mount of vision has been gained, And all our fondest hopes and aims attained? If this be true, then our good friends who die Move only upward to their homes on high, That they may all the better help us rise To ou bright home above the azure skies, Where care has no abiding place to stay, And where all blinding tears are wiped away. his thought is true, at least, to nature's law,

She always seeks some height from which to draw The lower things up to the higher place; And nature at this point agrees with grace.

Ad astra caput, Romans wisely said,
"Head to the stars," in English it is read.
This sentence p ints the way to lofty ground,
To which we rise on ladder, round by round,
Expansion, proper, is a noble word,
When rightly meant its message should be heard;
But still there is another greater term,
One which contains the very central germ
Of all true progress and of deathless fame;
Ascension is that great word's name.
We fill our eyes with borizental views,
From length and breadth we gather all our news,
While most we need to know and truly love,
Comes to us, not from earth, but from above.
Then upward let our waiting eyes be turned,
For much there is for us yet to be learned,
Of that great realm where nothing false or base
Can enter in or find a resting place
Two worlds are ours: we live in one below
To day; to morrow to the other go.
And yet, just now we hang between the two,
So that, in one, whate'er we say or do,
The other makes a record of it sure,
Which in that world forever will endure.
This record always stands against each name,
And makes for glory or for lasting shame.
See, then, responsibility so great,
Faint courage sinks beneath its pond'rous weight.

CANTO XII.

THE FINAL VICTORY.

Strong opposition whets the weary mind, As ene cise the appetite, in kind
They differ, and they differ in their name,
But at the point compared they are the same.
In fact the former is by nature highly prized
As means by which we may be exercised
In both our minds and bodies, so that we
From craven fear and weakness may be free.
We can not even walk unless our feet
The solid earth and they do somewhere meet;
Each step opposed, the next one helps to take,
And thus opposing forces really make
What we call progress, and a reason give
Why nearly all great men and women live
Within that narrow belt of earth where life
And all the seasons are at endless strife.
This fact should help us in our moral fight,
To bravely mees and put our foes to flight.
In this great fight no easy task is ours;
We wrestle not with flesh and blood, but powers
Of darkness in the spirit's lofty sphere;
And yet if God be for us we'll not fear.
Great difficulties will our pa'hway block;
Each day across our road, like some huge rock,
They will our steady progress seek to check;
And here is where weak, timid souls find wreck.

Napoleon once desired the Alps to cross. To save his cause from suff'ring c rtain loss; One of his aids he sent to test he way, And make a full report without delay, If possible a passage cou'd be made; "'Tis barely possible," declared the aid. "Then forward," was Napoleon's quick reply, And every soldier had to do or die. We fight in a much more noble cause; Why, then, should we find time to fear or pause? All things are possible to faith that's strong, While failure always follows with the wrong. No easy road we'll find on duty's way, But strength is promised for each weary day. Huge mountains on our pathway must be scaled, In climbing which some have already failed. But is it possible our work to do? If so, we all our efforts should renew, And by the most determined purpose make A great and final forward move to take The world for our imperial, sovereign Lord; And thus to end all wars and sin's discord. Truth's banner then would be alone unfurled, And wave in triumph o'er a conquered world.

A VISION OF THE FUTURE.

From this high point of view I plainly see A vision clear of what the world will be, When all the nations shall the praises sing Of him who is our Prophet, Priest and King. I see a time when bloody wars shall cease, And in their stead reign universal peace, When pruning hooks shall take the place of spears, And love shall rule all hearts instead of fears. I see also in that great coming day, That cold commercialism will not sway The lives of men for filtby lucre's sake;

But energy will then be used to make
And bless a free and noble brotherhood,
In which the aim of all is highest good,
Where sefishness, with ugly vivage, dies
Beside the wreck of sordid, corp'rate he,
Which have so long with hungry, selfish greed
Refused to listen to the cry of need
Which comes from weary selfish greed;
Whose fearful sauggle in this world for rest
Should make the very stones cry out for shame
Agninst the men who chiefly are to blame
For all the inequalities of life,
That gender and maintain a wicked strife.
But in my view this evil is no more,
The time has some at last when rich and poor
Are terms which have no longer any place

Within the sacred sphere of saving grace. But just like Jew and Greek, and bond and free, These terms are lost in Love's great symphony. This blessed vision is no idle dream, The present throbs and glows with things that seem

To promise and to clearly indicate
The ush'ring in of that millennial state,
Where our sweet peace shall like the rivers be,
And all our righteousness like waves of sea.

Upon the dim and mystic borderland Of nineteen Christian centuries now we stand; A century new begins to faintly dawn, To take the place of one that's nearly gone, While echoes from the years of all the past Are ringing down the ages, like a blast F om northern climes upon the dawning spring, And hushing birds which had begun to sing. These echoes find the air with sad refrains Of injuries done and vile, unrighteous gains; Of wrongs committed and of rights betrayed, Of br ken promises and debts unpaid, Of wasted opportunities and powers, Of squardered privileges and murdered hours, Of sad bereavements and of dismal blights, Of waiting long throughout the weary nights; Of storms and tempests on the raging seas, Of deep despondency and fell disease, Of hopes all shattered in the rushing tide That sweeps t'ward death with fast and reckless stride.

But these sad echoes all are fully met With songs of joy to brightest music set; There drive back strife, which comes from days of yore, yore,

And wsher in an age, when never more
The discords of the past shall break or mar
Our Gospel music by a single jar;
An age in which we'll tell, with one accord,
The geories of our royal, sovereign Lord,
And men shall own and everywhere maintain
The majesty of his imperial reign.
We wait with patience for that age to bring These splendid honors to our Lord and King.

A Thing of Beauty.

The new General Catalogue of the Christian Publishing Company is now ready to be sent to all who ask for it. It is a book of just 100 pages, printed on fine paper, with an artistically designed cover. It contains 79 portraits and illustrations, many of these being half tone plates. It will be sent free, and postpaid, to all who request it. Just drop us a postal card and we will do the rest.

The new General Catalogue contains full descriptive price-lists of books, pamphlets, tracts, Bibles of all kinds, Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor Supplies, Church requisites, maps, blackboards, communion sets, baptismal pants, record books, marriage certificates, song books, etc., etc. An examination will show that prices have been very generally reduced. It will pay you to have a copy of this catalogue handy for reference.

If you want a copy you must send for it. We will gladly give a copy to anyone sufficiently interested to ask for it, but we do not care to send it out indiscriminately. It is too costly a book for that.

ABSTRACT REPORT OF THE AMERICAN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The Acting Board in presenting its report says:

"The American Christian Missionary Society is simply a committee to act as the agent of those who desire to work through our organization and thus co operate with each other for the special purpose of preaching the primitive gospel of the New Testament throughout the United States and Canada. Its service consists in presenting to our brethren the various fields of work, the ripe harvest field of America, and in enlarging the place of our tents by helping our few and weak brethren plant the Church of Christ. The Acting Board receives the offerings of the brethren and administers the trust as those that must give an account unto God and to the brotherhood. Our appeal is to the highest motives-love and loyalty to our divine Lord, obedience to his commands, the love of souls to be won to Christ, loyalty to truth in Christ Jesus, the broadest patriotism, the supreme desire to so lengthen our cords and strengthen our stakes that we may enlarge the place of our tents until we shall be able to send the gospel all around the earth-with these high motives it seeks to promote the growth of the kingdom by gathering the offerings of the people and using these offerings in upbuilding the cause of New Testament Christianity, and doing with her might the work committed to her hands, the preaching of the gospel to America. To this work we invite the co-operation and support of every lover of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.'

| All of these men were faithful to the gos- |

All of these men were faithful to the gospel which they preached. Of godly women there passed into the land beyond:

Mrs. Nancy T. Brown, of Indiana, widow of the pioneer R. T. Brown.

Mrs Sarah Keene, of Kentucky, widow of the late C. M. Keene.

Mrs. Sarah H. Reese, Michigan, wife of J. H.

Mrs. Lydia Grice, Michigan, wife of John Grice. Mrs. Louise Davis Pinkerton, wife of C. M. Pinkerton, Blackburn, Mo.

Mrs. Kate Redd, wife of E. B. Redd.
Mrs. C. M. Irelan, Topeka, Kan.
Mrs. Maria Paraley, Painesville, Ohio.
Miss Eliza L. Mills, Braddock, Pa.
Mrs. Anna J. Waters, Allegheny, Pa.
Mrs. Sallie Carlton, Bonham, Texas.
Mrs. Julius Stone, Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin.

Of the above Mrs. Maria Parmley left a bequest of $1,000 to the American Christian Missionary Society and $2,000 to the Board of Church Extension; Miss Eliza L. Mills left $1,000 to the American Christian Missionary Society and a like amount to the Foreign Society and also to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions; Mrs. Anna Waters left bequests of $5,000 each to the American Christian Missionary Society; the Christian Woman's Board of Missions; the Foreign Church Missionary Society and Bethany College.

Of representative brethren who have passed over the river, we name: John Hampshire, of Indiana, who left property valued at $10,000 to be divided between the American Missionary Society and the Board of Church Extension; Henry O. Devries, Omaha, Nebraska, the fruitful business man and state superintendent of Sunday-school work; Alex. Sanders, ex-Governor and United States Senator, a loyal disciple whose public life was clean and whose private life was pure; John W. Andrews, Port Gibson, Miss., a large-hearted giver to the cause of missions, full of good works; G. W. Henthorn, charter member of the Church at Paiderville, Wisconsin; Joseph Irwin Sweeney, son of J. T. Sweeney, of Indiana, a bright young man of 22 years; he had just decided to give his life to the work of the ministry; John H. Drake, brother of Gen. F. M. Drake, a devoted member of the Church, a successful business man; Henry Ranshaw, Covington, Kentucky, 30 years an elder of the Church, father of George B. Ranshaw, a good man and full of the Holy Spirit; John C. Probst, Pomeroy, Ohio, a brother-in-law of Isaac Errett and a fruitful Christian and leader in temperance work.

Our Texas brotherhood lost many members of the Church during the hurricane of September 7 and 8. Our Mission Church at Galveston suffered grievously. Only about 20 members are left.

C. C. SMITH'S SICKNESS.

In the middle of April, C. C. Smith was compelled to give up work on account of a nervous break-down; he was able to attend the conventions of Texas and Arkansas in June; the doctor ordered him to rest if he desired to recover his health; your board voted him a vacation for this purpose. His absence has been like taking a reaper out of the harvest field. We are glad to report that he is improving and with care will be able to serve the Church for many years.

SUMMARY OF WORK.

The number of missionaries in the employ of the Society for the year ending September 30, 1900, is 163. Adding the 27 persons employed by the B. N. E. E., we have a total of 195, supported by the offering to the American Christian Missionary Society. These have been employed in 37 states and territories as follows: New England, New York, Maryland, Eastern Pennsylvania, West r P ennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, New Mexico, Arizona, Southern California, Northern California, Oregon, Tennessee, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, Indian Territory, Oklahoma, Washington, Idaho, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ontario, Canada West, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Puerto Rico.

In addition to this we have done work in city evangelization or city missions, in Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo, Memphis, Mobile, New Orleans, Galveston, San Antonio, St. Louis, St. Paul, Omaha, Greater Pitts burg, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Altoona, Harrisburg.

The aggregate of missionary labor performed is 101 years, six months.

The number of places helped by missionary labor is 389.

The number of additions to the Church by the labor of these missionaries is 6,028 and 53 Churches have been organized during the year, also 23 houses of worship have been completed.

THE TREASURY.

We began the year with a balance of $3 460 in the treasury and no indebtedness. On account of our receiving so much more in the Jubilee year than ever before, the calls upon the Acting Board for appropriations went beyond any previous year in number and urgency; many who had waited long and almost hopelessly for help from your board, now urged their claims with persistence; the Acting Board made larger appropriations for 1900 than any other previous year.

During the year we have received from all sources, for all purposes, a total of $63-627.30, as follows:

| | *, ** -* | | |
|------|------------------------------------|--------|----|
| From | churches$ | 32,393 | 90 |
| From | Bible-schools | 2,778 | 87 |
| From | Christian Endeavor Societies | 625 | 17 |
| From | Ladies' Aid and other societies | 578 | 60 |
| From | individuals | 6,975 | 07 |
| From | other sources, Int., subscriptions | 20,275 | 69 |

Total $ 63,627 30

The various state and district societies raised and expended for mission work in their respective fields, $114,368.53.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions has expended for Home Missions $30,000, making a total of money raised, reported and expended for Home Missions, $144,368.53.

The aggregate of results shows 1,363 places helped; 202 Churches organized; 16,009 additions to Churches.

For these results we should thank our God for the fulfillment of his promise that his word should not return unto him void, but should accomplish that whereunto he has sent it.

OUR FORCES.

The increasing list of our missionaries is a matter of pride and pleasure to your board, we anticipate the day when we shall have a thousand home missionaries telling the glad story; preaching primitive, apostolic Christianity and shepherding the scattered sheep of our folds. Too much credit cannot be given to our noble, heroic and self-sacrificing home missionaries and their wives. There is no nobler company of men and women engaged in the service of their Lord and his gospel. If our brethren and sisters could know these missionaries in their homes and in their work, they would give eagerly and generously to their support. Then all the resources for a great enlargement would be forthcoming.

The Appropriations for the year just closed are larger than ever before. The report says:

"Relying upon the increasing interest manitasted by our brotherhood in the work of the evanpelization of America, your Board has made more appropriations than in any previous year of our work, as the reports will indicate. Our chiefest difficulty is in making the meagre sums we have to appropriate meet the deepest needs. Each lection insists that somebody else is receiving more than its share. Your Board tries to weigh the relative claims of each, and while we would ladly appropriate much more largely to these mission fields, we must observe carefully the limtations of our treasury. We feel that we have no right to plunge this work into debt by reckless appropriations, but we do plead for larger reources that we may more adequately answer the three hundred appeals for assistance that are now waiting the decision of the incoming Board. The fact that we are to-day about $3,000 in debt shows that your Board has gone to the very limit of prudence in our appropriations."

OUR EXPENSE ACCOUNT.

To prosecute the work committed to our nands necessitates workers, the collection of missionary funds, the careful, prudent lisbursement of those funds to secure the best results, the wise administration of the trust committed to our hands; these are absolutely essential to any efficiency in missionary work; it is no more impossible to have a government without some taxation than to do successful missionary work without some expense.

If our brethren will remember that we have the expenses of two Boards, the American Christian Missionary Society and the Board of Negro Education and Evangelization, we believe the most thorough examination of the accounts submitted with this report will show that the work has been managed with the closest economy consistent with efficiency.

The Board has found, in its experience of years in the management of missions, that it requires constant urging and pushing to induce the brethren to take offerings for missions. In the great pressure that comes upon them for other matters, in the multitude of appeals for local and benevolent purposes, the work of missions is forgotten, unless the appeals are continued and persistent. Four-fifths of the necessary cost of the management of this work is the money we find it necessary to expend to secure the offerings of the churches and the brotherhood.

We find that it is like a train going up grade. As soon as the pressure ceases the train stops and the momentum attained is in direct proportion to the amount of pressure applied.

During the last year we have made two experiments which we desire to report. In regard to Forefathers' Day, in the autumn of 1899, the Board expended no money to induce the societies to observe that day, merely making an appeal through the newspapers for its observance. The result was that we lost 213 societies in the number observing the day, and the offering from the day dropped down from $1,222.74, the amount received in 1899, to $501.64, the amount received in 1900 from this source. We saved $32 in expenses and lost $721.10 in income, besides any educational value that would have come of the general observance of Forefathers' Day.

Another experiment was tried also. Last year the Board sent out an immense number of personal letters asking for offerings for this work. The cost of the effort was $1,800, and the income resulting from it was $7,300 in personal offering. This year we did not send out those letters, but saved that $1,800 in the expense account, nor did we receive the $7,300 in personal offerings—a loss of $5,500.

These are simply samples of what we find in our experience in this work. Ninety per cent. of our expense account is in money expended to secure the offerings of churches and individuals, and we find that it is true here that if we sow bountifully we reap bountifully, and if we sow sparingly, we also reap sparingly. Some true friends of the work have insisted that we advertise very much more liberally, from the fact that it is computed that not more than one hundred thousand of our million members are actually contributing to the work of Home Missions.

The report then deals with the special named funds of $5,000 each, given last year, and tells of the work being done by the interest on these funds.

Another paragraph deals with Annuity Funds, giving details of the Annuity Plea and a list of those giving annuity funds last year.

The different fields are represented, with reports from the missionary pastor, giving detailed statements of the work done and results obtained in the various mission fields; these are bright, hopeful and indicate successful work.

There is a report for every State Board of Missions, giving details of work done by these various State Boards. This phase of the work is to be commended, as it gives for the first time an adequate statement of the work done by our various State Boards.

The report closes with a plea for enlargement of our Home Mission work. In the presence of the greatest, ripest mission field in all the world, the hands of our Home Board are tied; three hundred appeals are unanswered; the Board has appropriated beyond their income; the appeal is that Home Missions (the evangelization of the needy parts of the United States) and Foreign Missions be made equal. The Acting Board says: "The Acting Board would press upon the minds and hearts of our brethren the need of greatly increasing the income of the society; the record of the past justified the claims of the Mother Missionary Society to be entrusted with larger means to do the greater work yet before us and in supporting the work already begun."

Our religious movement will pass, as others, through these great periods, the controversial, the evangelistic and the educational: contending earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the Saints; baptizing the people into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever he has commanded them. The characteristics of these three eras are not always separable. We are going to blend the three in our career in the next twenty-five years; marvelous results are easily within our reach within that period if we are loyal and obedient to the heavenly vision and the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Unless one has noted closely he cannot realize the marvelous growth of the last fifteen years; our recent history should inspire us with lofty ideals. We need to hold fast the truth in Christ Jesus; to stand with open minds and hearts to receive the new light constantly breaking forth out of God's word.

We are the heirs of the past, the trustees for the future, Disciples in Christ's school, we should do our full part toward teaching others his precious Word, disseminating his gospel and thus honoring God and blessing man.

BENJ. L. AND C. C. SMITH, Cor. Sec's. Cincinnati, Ohio.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL RE-PORT OF THE FOREIGN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The past year has been the most prosperous in the history of the Society. The receipts from all sources amount to $180,-016.16. This is a gain over the previous year of $27,288.78. The contributing churches number 3,067, a gain of 16. The churches, as churches, gave $65,964.39; a gain of $9,182.62. The offerings of the churches average $21.50; this is a gain of 40 per cent. over the average four years ago. The churches that reached their full apportionment number 972, a gain of 125. Four churches have been added to the list of those that support a missionary each. These are as follows: Franklin Circle, Cleveland. Ohio; Sixth and Prospect, Kansas City, Mo.; Frankfort, Ky; Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The contributing Sunday-schools number 3,260, a gain of 73. Those that reached their full apportionment number 1,089, a gain of 87. The children that constitute the One Dollar League number 1,300, a gain of 500 over last year. The whole amount given by the Sunday-schools in the year is $42,705.04, a gain of $3,633.32. The contributing Endeavor Societies number 335; their offerings amount to $2,965.82. There has been a gain of 791 in the number of individual offerings; the whole number is 1,681. There has been a falling off in the bequests. Only $2,229.55 has been received from this source. The Society has received in the year on the Annuity Plan $30,425. Part of this has been put into buildings and part has been invested.

The Force.—Since the last Convention, C. S. Weaver and F. E. Hagin and their families, and Miss Carme Hostetter have sailed for Japan. G. W. Brown and family and Miss M. L. Clark have gone to India. L. C. McPherson and Melvin Menges and families have gone to Havana, Cuba; E. W. Pease and family to Norway. Abram E. Cory and wife have gone to Honolulu. Frank T. Lea and wife have been engaged in Africa. Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Wharton have found it necessary to resign. Miss Carrie E. Goodrich has united with another mission.

Land and Buildings .- Chapels have been secured at Wuhu and Wu Wei Cho, China. The chapel and the young ladies' home in Nankin, and the home of W. P. Bentley at Shanghai, have been completed. Three hundred dollars have been granted for a dispensary at Chu Cheo, China. For the en largement of the school building in Harda, India, $1,500 was appropriated, and $500 for the school building in Mungeli, and $400 toward the roof on the bungalow. A lot costing $2,500 has been purchased in Osaka, Japan. Money was previously granted for the building.

REPORTS FROM THE FIELD.

India .- The work has five branches: the evangelistic, the medical, the educational, the literary and the benevolent. The converts for the year number 65; the children in Sunday-schools, 1,831; in day schools, 515; patients treated, 32,589. The gospel has been preached in the churches, in the hospitals, in the homes, in the bazars, and in the surrounding villages. Work is carried on at four main stations and at a nu nber of out-stations. The Methodist Mission in Hurda has been turned over to the Society. In the orphanage at Damoh there are 400 boys. Most of these are famine orphans. Those that are large enough are being taught trades. They are being prepared to support themselves while in the orphanage and after leaving it. The women of the Mission have done what they could to reach the women in their homes. They find the Hindu anl Mohammedan women very willing to listen to the message of salvation. They are not always free to accept it. Husbands and parents somet mes prevent them from confessing their faith in Christ. At the hill stations considerable work has been done among the soldiers. Some of these have gone to South Africa and to other parts of the world. Wherever they have gone they have tried to win their associates to Christ. The school work has been particularly gratifying. The government examiner complimented the work of Miss Josepha Franklin in the highest terms. Of the boys who appeared before the government examiner all passed. Much of the time of the missionaries has been taken up with famine relief. The Society has received $15,000 for famine relief. In addition to this over $20,000 has been sent to the missionaries in India. This has been sent by The Christian Herald, by the American Free Baptists, by the English Baptists, by the Baptists of Canada by the churches in Australasia, and by the friends in England. Large quantities of grain have been placed at their disposal to be sold for food or seed or to be given away. A great amount of clothing and blankets has been furnished them for the same purpose. Thousands of starving and worthy people have been relieved and saved alive.

Japan.-The converts for the past year number 95; present membership is 706; children in the Sunday-schools, 738; in the day schools, 150. The missionaries live at four points. At 36 other points the gospel is preached more or less regularly. In the year the missionaries have given most of their time to evangelistic work. They have traveled far and near. They have sought to press the claims of the gospel home to the hearts and consciences of many thousands in that empire who before had never heard the gospel. The school work has been somewhat crippled by recent legislation. The missionaries report that there is a disposition now to construe the laws more favorably. In the girls' home the inmates are taught habits of cleanliness, neatness, promptness and truthfulness. The visible results are very gratifying. Meetings are held for mothers, also. The women of Japan are, as a rule, ignorant. Work among them does not bear speedy fruit. The women in the mission teach Sunday schools, gather the women about them and instruct them, visit them in their homes and teach them there. They teach the children and young men who wish to study English. The Mission publishes a Sunday school paper and also a monthly magazine entitled, "The Bible Way." The missionaries report that the Japanese are more willing to hear the truth than they have been for some time past. Four years ago nearly all the teachers in Akita were outspoken against the Christian religion. Now, without exception, they praise it and recommend their students to study it. A heathen priest invited R. L. Pruett to preach in his temple. He assembled an audience of over one thousand people, who listened attentively to the preaching of the gospel for an hour and a half. The temple authorities bore all the expense of the meeting. Since the last Convention the Mission in Japan has been strengthened by the addition of five new workers. A soon as these master the language they will be able to teach and

China. - The work in China for the year has been very gratifying. The additions number 183. The present membership is 565. The boarding school pupils number 75; the day school pupils, 169; pupils in the Sunday-schools, 284. The patients seen number 15,252. All departments of the work have been carried on as usual. In Nankin the chapel and young ladies' home have been completed. This chapel is a great joy to all connected with the mission. It is a substantial building and will seat about 400 people. There has been much preaching in Nankin and in the adjacent country. The new dormitory has been of great value to the college. The number of boys has increased to 50. Many of these are earnest Christians and are doing what they can for the conversion of their fellow pupils. Dr. W. E. Macklin, in addition to his medical work, has done much preaching and writing. In Shanghai a new chapel on the Yangtsepoo Road has been completed. An influential Chinaman gave to the mission a building for a girls' school. The institute has been a hive of busy workers. In it Bible women, evangelists, teachers and colporteurs are being trained. The gospel is preached in it every day in the year. Mrs. Saw and Miss Kelly and Dr. Daisy Macklin have spent most of their time working among the women. One encouraging feature of the work is the disposition to do what can be done in the way of self-support. The converts are eager to do their part. At Chu Cheo there has been a great interest in religion. The converts there number 86. Much of the work has been done by the native Christians, they have brought in their friends and neighbors and have led them to Christ. At Lu Cheo Fu the home of C. B. Titus has been completed. There has been some disturbance at that point, but nothing very serious. At Wuhu there has been much interest manifested by the women. Mrs. Molland and Miss Kellar have been active in teaching them the way of the Lord. In the Yangtse Valley, where our missionaries are, there has been no disturbance. It was thought wise for the missionaries to go to Shanghai for a season, but at no time were they in any danger. The viceroys assured them of the r protection. None of the property of the Society has been dam-

Turkey .- The converts for the year number 65; the present membership, 529. There are in the Sunday-schools 535 pupils; in the day schools, 355. The society has now been at work in Constantinople 21 years. G. N. Shishmanian has preached in the city, visited Smyrna, Bardezag and Nicomnedia, and written many letters to believers in different parts of the empire. He reports that prospects for work in Turkey are brighter and more promising than ever before. A. L. Chapman has devoted most of his time to the study of the language. In addition, he has taught, preached, and performed other duties connected with the mission. On Sunday afternoons he has preached in English and occasionally in Armenian. To the children in the schools he has spoken twice a week, giving an outline course of Bible study covering both the Old Testament and the New, and has conducted a night class in English for young men and young women. Mrs. Chapman has taught two classes in the school three times a week. Garabed Kevorkian has charge of the work at seven different points. He is assisted by thirteen teachers and helpers. He has spent four months visiting the churches. There is a constant demand for his presence and services. No one man can do all that should be done in his field. John Johnson reports that though he has had the joy of adding but one soul to the membership, he has faith in the promise that in due season he shall reap if he does not faint. He has started a Sunday-school, and preaches, as he is able, in Turkish. The members of the church have been very regular in their attendance at the Sunday services and at the mid week meetngs, and show many signs of growth in grace. He preaches from three to four times a week. He feels the need of a day school with a papelle native helper, or of medical work. He realizes that something must be done to nterest the people in the gospel.

England .- Owing to the war spirit all Christian work has been practically at a tandstill. This, and a revision of the church olls, will account for the fact that there is slight loss in membership reported. The umber of baptisms for the year is 225. The vorkers have been unusually active; they ave sought in every way to prevail upon he people to accept Christ as their Savior nd Lord. H. L. Willett, of the Chicago Iniversity, has visited the churches and iven a course of lectures in each. These vere reported to be a mental and spiritual east. Now that the war is over, it is beeved that the churches will enter upon a ew career of prosperity. While there has een a slight net loss in membership, it is ratifying to know that there has been a rain in the amounts contributed for the year or all purposes. The churches are trying o reduce the indebtedness on their property. hey give generously for the enlargement of he work in the regions beyond. Dr. Mary . McGavran and Miss Clark are supported y them in India. Generous amounts are iven to the work of the society in other Scandanavia. - The converts reported in he year number 81; present membership, .209: children in the Sunday-schools, 369. Dr. Holck reports that emigration has helped to hin their ranks. Most of the churches get nly a flying visit from the evangelists; the est of the year they must do without assistnce. Several of them have been visited by R. P. Anderson, who reports them in good ondition and looking forward hopefully to he winter's work. There are many openngs in places where we have a few members, out there is no one to enter in and organize hen. The Christians in Norway are deighted over the appointment of E. W. Pease. ulius Cramer has left Malmo and has gone o Fredrikshald. I. P. Lilljenstein takes his place at Maimo, and preaches also at Ramlosa. Next year it will be 25 years since the work began in Copenhagen. It is proposed to hold a ubilee meeting with representatives present rom Norway and Sweden.

Hawaiian Islands.—Abram E. Cory and amily were sent to Honolulu in June last. The work was begun there at the earnest equest and at the expense of Lathrop Cooley. There are on the islands 125,000 beople. The population is composed of Hawaiians, Portuguese, Chinese, Japanese, Europeans and Americans. The work must be done chiefly in English. Honolulu is on the highway between San Francisco and the far East. The population is growing. Thus far Bro. Cory has fixed upon no definite work. He is surveying the field and is in conference with the committee and with the workers on the ground.

Africa.—The missionaries have been at Bolengi throughout the year. They have been hindered much by sickness. They have, lowever, attempted and accomplished something. Bolengi is on the Congo River, 700 miles from its mouth and exactly on the equator. For 60 miles below and 50 above no Christian influence reaches the people. The missionaries could travel 2,000 miles east without meeting a Christian or any missionary agencies, and almost as far west. The people are untutored savages. Their weapons of defense are made by themselves of iron, and are cleverly done. They have a capacity for receiving instruction and training that is very cheering. They live in settled villages, cultivate the soil, hunt, fish, and rear goats and fowls. They have no form of worship, but are strong believers in the supernatural and have numerous charms to keep away evil ones. The gospel is preached regularly at the station and along the rivers. A school has been established with 132 pupils in it. There is a daily clinic. This is largely attended. All diseases and troubles are treated free. Several people have been inquiring what to do to be saved. There are no words in their language for believe, repent, or confess. New words must be formed, or old words must be taken and cleansed and filled with new meaning. In the year fencing, building, and roofing and other repairs have demanded a large expenditure of time, patience and energy. The missionaries report that the other workers on the Upper Congo, the American Baptists, the English Baptists and the Congo Balolo Mission, are on friendly terms with them. They help each other all possible. All are immersionists and the natives do not know any difference or make any distinction. The outlook for the coming year is good.

Cuba. - After the convention in Cincinnati, L. C. McPherson and Melvin Menges and their families sailed for Havana. They began to speak the Sunday following their arrival. They opened a mission early in December. They have neld two services each Sunday and one on Wednesday evening. The attendance is good and the interest encouraging. They report 11 confessions and baptisms, and others reclaimed. They have gained friends among Americans, Cubans and Spaniards. They have spoken many times in the batteries, in other missions and in the prisons. In April they organized a Sunday-school. The attendance has been from 20 to 45. They have studied all the time in view of preaching and teaching in Spanish. Their present mission room is well located for English work. Throngs of Cubans and Spaniards stand about the barred windows to listen to and observe the work. The women are active in the Sunday-school and in the church and in the temperance work.

Conclusion.—The era of modern missions began with the present century. There are now in the field 13,607 missionaries and 73,613 native helpers. These labor at 5,233 stations and 25,538 out-stations. The churches that have been organized have a membership of 1,289,298. The Christian community numbers 4,327,283. The native contributions last year amounted to $1,833,991. The contributions at home and abroad for missions amounted to $17,161,092. The whole number of schools established is 20,-

374; the whole number of youths under instruction, 1,049,309. The Bible has been translated in whole or in part into 421 languages and dialects. In the 355 hospitals and 753 dispensaries, 2,579,651 patients are treated annually. Schools for the blind have been opened, orphanages, leper asylums, foundling asylums and homes for infants have been established; mission ships have been built; institutions for the training of missionaries have been founded and endowed. The Students' Volunteer Missionary Movement has touched most of the great schools of Christendom. Considering the short time the Church has been at work this exhibit is a very creditable one. But when we think of the needs of the world, and the boundless resources of Christendom, it will be seen that only a beginning has been made. Of no field can it be said that it is fully occupied. Almost every station is under manned. We should enter the new century with a determination to do far more than we have ever attempted. The missionaries on the field should be reinforced. The money needed for their complete equipment should be supplied. Fervent and effectual prayers should be offered for the workers and the people to whose redemption they have devoted their lives. There should be more fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, that the time may be hastened when he shall see of the travail of his soul and be

TWELFTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF CHURCH EXTENSION.

The recommendation of our last three National Conventions was that the brother-hood strive to reach one quarter of a million for Church Extension by the close of this year. On October first we had in our Extension Fund $252,129.13. The hopes of our people have been more than realized. To Him Who is the Author of all good gifts and to His Son, let all the praise be ascribed.

The Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati last October recommended that $50,000 of new receipts be raised this year to insure the reaching of $250,000. Our new receipts, including interest, are $57,118.83, a gain of $9,454.48 over last year.

OFFERINGS FROM THE CHURCHES.

The Annual Offering for Church Extension is a matter of graver concern to our Board each year. This year the receipts from the churches are $10,337.47, a gain of only $244 over last year. While the Board is grateful for the gain and thankful to the churches that take the offering, it is the non contributing churches about which we are anxious. True, there are qui e a number of churches that are contributing through the payments of individuals on five-year pledges secured during the visits of the Corresponding Secretary, but this should not keep these same congregations from observing the Offering, Day and enlisting, through the Offering, such members as have not pledged or new members that are coming into the church from time to time. Each member should have the privilege of joining in this good Every member of every church should make an offering every year to Church Extension. At least the Board of Church Extension should have offerings from every church that contributes to the Foreign and Home Societies.

OUR ANNUITY FUNDS.

The Annuity Feature of Church Extension has been found so practical that the Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati recommended as follows: "That we give special emphasis to the Annuity feature of our Extension work, experience having already demonstrated its extraordinary value."

The Annuity Plan in our Church Extension work is as follows: The Board receives money from generously disposed friends of Church Extension, on which it pays six per cent. interest annually as long as the donor lives. At the death of the person so giving his money, the gift becomes the permanent property of the Church Extension Fund without further obligations on the part of the Board. The money will be loaned out to build churches, just as other funds of the Board, but will be loaned at six per cent., the amount paid the annuitant, instead of at four per cent., the amount charged on General Fund loans. The Board cannot now answer the appeals for money to finish mission chapels, and many congregations are glad to get money at six per cent. when they cannot possibly borrow on the ground except at eight to 12 and 24 per cent.

How much better it is to give money to this Fund and have it building churches while it is earning six per cent., than to have it earning the same per cent. in some secular employment where it may not be well secured, and where time will be wasted in reinvestment. The interest will always be paid promptly, and at the death of the annuitant the money will go directly into the Church Extension Fund, where it would have been placed by will. The money is earning the annuitant the same interest and he can see his money building churches while he lives, and, without contest, will go where he wants it to go at his death.

The Board urges persons who expect to leave money to this Fund in the form of bequests to consider the Annuity Plan.

There is now in our Annuity Fund

$36,251.13. The Board receives amounts of $100 or more. The following amounts have been received this year:

OUR NAMED LOAN FUNDS.

Two Named Loan Funds have been received this year:

Louisville, Ky., First Church Loan Fund. Augusta, Ga., First Church Loan Fund.

Making Nine Named Loan Funds in all. On these, separate reports are made each year to the individual or the church creating such Fund. With one accord they report to the Board that it is an inspiration to receive the report of the multiplying power of their Named Loan Funds. By the plan of the Named Loan Fund feature of this work, the four per cent. interest and the returns on loans come back into the Fund and go out again to build churches. No part of the interest is used to pay current expenses, but is constantly building up the Fund.

A Named Loan Fund is created by an individual or church giving $5,000 in cash or subscribing that amount to be paid within ten years, by annual contributions. Fund so created is named for the Donor or any one whom he may designate.

In every case the Board requires first mortgage security, with an absolutely clear title and with the house insured against fire, and also against cyclones in certain localities. Our loan must be the only debt on the property. The loan is to be returned to the Board in five equal annual payments with four per cent. interest, payable semiannually.

LOANS GRANTED BUT NOT CLOSED.

From Oct. 1, 1899, to Sept. 30th, 1900, 56 loans have been granted, but not closed, aggregating $47,900. These will be closed as soon as satisfactory arrangements have been made.

CATALOGUE OF CHURCH PLANS.

Our Board has given considerable help this year in furnishing up-to-date, practical plans for our mission churches and their architecture is constantly improving. Working plans are furnished at half the rates they can be secured elsewhere. The catalogue of seventy plans will be sent for ten cents. We will add new designs from year to year.

The Catalogue of Plans also furnishes excellent advice to building committees. This advice is not voluntary upon the part of the Board, but is given because it has been requested by our mission churches. The advice is the combined wislom of all Boards of Church Extension and is the result of years of experience.

FACING THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

With a quarter million in our Extension Fund our home missionary forces can face the work of the twentieth century with renewed confidence, knowing that when the gospel is preached and infant organizations effected in new and growing communities, their work will not be wasted for lack of permanent establishment. After all, we must acknowledge that preaching the gospel and organizing churches is but pitching the tents of the scouting party. There must be a church building adequate to the demands of the situation and it must come quickly, or great advantage will be lost that cannot be regained in years, when once the confidence of the community has been shaken by tardy measures. And we must create an Extension Fund large enough so that there will be no question about our entering the cities as well as the smaller towns. It is not for us to hesitate because it costs to enter the cities where opportunity invites. Christ would not have us count the cost. He said, "Go!" and who are we that we should hesitate and refuse? Secular loan funds will not loan to the mission, neither in city nor town. They have said so. They will loan to older organizations, but not to the mission, which is looked upon as an experiment. And where missions have borrowed from secular sources, in so many cases our Board has had to step in and save the property from sale by mortgage fore losure. When our Board Church Extension holds the mortgage, the mission property can never pass from the hands of the brotherhood.

To meet, then, the increasing demands of a growing religious body and to take care of these new organizations that God has given us, by the preaching of the gospel, we must fix our eyes constantly upon the new watchword: "A half million for Church Extension by 1905."

Respectfully submitted, D. O. SMART, Pres. G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec. (In behalf of the Board.)

Among the Clergy.

COFFE & BEING REPLACED BY POSTUM FOOD COFFEE.

"I am the wife of a minister. About three years ago a warm friend, an exemplary mother and the conscientious wife of a minister, asked me if I had ever tried giving up coffee and using the Postum Food Coffee. I had been telling her of my excessive nervousness and ill health. She said: 'We drink nothing else for breakfast but Postum Food Coffee, and it is a delight and a comfort to have something that we do not have to refuse the children when they ask for it.'

"I was surprised that she would permit the children to drink even the food coffee, but she explained that it was a most healthful beverage and that the children thrived on it. A very little thought convinced me that for brain work one should not rely upon a s'imulant such as coffee is, but should have food and the very best of food.

"My first trial of Postum was a failure. The maid of all work brought it to the table, lukewarm, weak, and altogether lacking in character. We were in despair, but decided on one more trial. At the second trial we faithfully followed directions, used four teaspoonsful to the pint of water. let it boil full fifteen minutes after the real boiling began, and served it with rich cream. It was delicious and we were all won.

"I have since sung the Praises of Postum Food Coffee on many, many occasions and have induced numbers of friends to abandon coffee and use Postum, with remarkable results. The wife of a college professor said to me a short time ago that nothing had ever produced so marked a change in her husband's health as the leaving off of coffee and the use of Postum Food Coffee." Edith Smith Davis, Appleton, Wis.

Our Budget.

- -Convention number, this.
- -See reports of missionary boards within.
- -Mark the growth of the missionary work.
- —Observe the increased offerings for missionary work over that of the last decade.
- -Note the rise of the missionary spirit among the Disciples of Christ as compared with that of a few years ago.
- —See also report of the convention to date by editorial correspondence. The report ends on Sunday night, but from it you can catch something of the enthusiasm and spirit of the present convention.
- —Of course you will read the parts of Dr. W. T. Moore's poem. It is one of the most finished literary productions he has yet given to the Church. We regret that we could not publish the entire poem in this number.
- —We are glad to give place this week on our first page to the picture of one who has filled so large a place in the extension of our cause in the State of Texas as Dr. Addison Clark. A man of liberal culture, of clear thought, of excellent spirit, who has exerted a wide and most salutary influence for that better interpretation of our plea in Texas, which is at the present time in the ascendency, and is making such hopeful progress. We call attention to the sketch of him by his friend, Frank H. Marshall, which appears elsewhere.
- -An awkward mistake in the make-up of the paper occurred last week which was not noticed until a few hundred copies had been run off. An editorial comment on an article advocating a beneficiary system for the Church was attached to the appeal of the Kentucky Orphans' Home at Louisville, calling for a "Twentieth Century Fund" endowment. Of course the editorial comment had no relevancy whatever to the 'Twentieth Century Fund" of the Orphans' Home, and we write this explanation to clear up the mystification in the minds of the few who may have seen the strange combination in the numbers of the paper run off before the error was corrected. "The Orphans' Home" appeal, which was crowded out by the correction, appears this week.
- -In a personal letter from D. M. Breaker, of Ladsones, S. C., he informs us that he has been dangerously ill with neuralgia of the heart, but that it has pleased the Lord to bring him up again. He is anxious to live long enough to publish his contemplated book of sermons, the prospectus of which he has published in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. He writes: "Pledges are coming in steadily, but not in sufficient numbers to warrant the hope that I shall be able to get the book out as soon as my condition seems to demand. If the brethren desire its publication a little more haste on their part seems to be necessary. One point your readers should know; if the book is not published they will not have to pay for it, and if it is published they will get value received." As the publication of this book of sermons of our brother depends upon the number of promises from brethren to take the book if published, we trust that those who feel an interest in the matter, not only in assisting a worthy brother but in enabling him to publish a book that will doubtless accomplish good, will write him at once on the subject.
- "A Creed that Needs no Revision" is the title of a neatly printed little tract by E. V. Zollars, president of Hiram College. It belongs to the vest-pocket series of tracts published by the standard Publishing Company, and clearly sets forth the creed of the New Testament—the creed that the world needs.

- -Elsewhere will be found an abstract of the report of the Acting Board of the American Christian Missionary Society to the Kansas City Convention. It will be noticed that the amount of funds raised this year is $63,600 against $100,000 last year. Last year, however, there were $25,000 in memorial funds and $8,000 in real estate. This very nearly covers the difference, as there is nothing from these latter sources this year. While substantial advance has been made, therefore, it is evident that we must still keep the motto "Home Missions to the Front" flying for a few years longer. We are not doing enough for Home Missions and it is to be feared that the ministers of the churches are not sufficiently aroused, after all that has been said, to the imperative need of expansion in Home Mission work. There seems to be a growing unity between the General Board and the State Boards which is to be commended. Every step in the direction of the unification of our work is a step in the right direction. A noticeable feature of the report is the large number of ministers who closed their earthly labors last year, and have passed on to their reward. When one looks over this list, he can hardly fail to raise the question in his mind as to whether we are sufficiently alive to the importance of filling up the ranks of our ministry with men of ability, character and special training. We ask in behalf of the Board careful reading of
- -We also publish an abstract of the report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the report of the Board of Church Extension. It will be seen by the reading of these reports that both the Foreign Society and Board of Church Extension have made decided progress during the year past. The special effort to reach the quarter of a million mark in the Church Extension Fund by the close of the present fiscal year has been successful, and the fund is already on the road to its half million mark, which the Secretary thinks we should reach by 1905. We hope our readers will take pains to read these important reports which give more information concerning the subjects they treat than can be found elsewhere in the same space.
- -We have read with considerable interest the pamphlet by W. W. Hopkins on "Public and Private Rights." It is a very thoughtful and suggestive contribution to the discussion of economic problems, now so prominent a theme before thinking people. The pamphlet deals with some of the fundamental principles of social life, and draws very clearly the line of distinction between public and private rights. One may not agree with every view expressed in the pamphlet; but he can hardly read it with an open mind without receiving fresh inspiration to study these problems anew on the general lines indicated in Mr. Hopkins' treatment of the subject. We commend the pamphlet to all who are interested in the present discussion of social questions.
- —In Wm. Remfry Hunt's article on "The Crisis in China," which appeared in our issue of Oct. 4th, the word "not" in the third line of the 2nd paragraph of the last column on page 1259, makes the writer say the opposite of what he intended. The sentence should read, "We do repudiate," etc., instead of "We do not repudiate," etc.
- —Permit me to express my appreciation of your editorial of September 20, on "Restoration and Progress in Religion." It is a clear statement of a fundamental idea in our movement. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was never better than now. I sincerely hope we shall have the benefit of your voice and pen for many years yet.

Kellogg, Ia. Fraternally, F. W. Collins.

- —Those who intend securing either the "Biographical and Historical Library" or the "Home Library" should remember that our special offers of these sets of books will expire with the close of the present month. The time is growing short.
- —Dr. B. B. Tyler informs us that Mrs. Tyler is still improving. Her speech is about rormal again. Dr. Tyler's headquarters, for a season at least, will be in Denver, Colo. His address is therefore changed from Chicago to 1042 Logan Ave., Denver, Colo. Dr. Tyler has been secured by the South Broadway Church of Christ in Denver and will devote his energies to the uplifting of that congregation in the Master's work. Dr. Tyler seems to be in great demand in the West, as also in every other place, and will do a good work in Denver.
- —Owing to the fact that we have given much space to the reports of our missionary boards in this paper we had to omit the excellent article on Bible Study for the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses and others, but hereafter expect the articles to appear regularly and in consecutive order. The articles on hand to date are not only of high order but in good spirit, exceedingly timely and helpful. No one who will read can help enjoying them and will not be without both intellectual and spiritual profit thereby. Much other matter of interest has had to be omitted this week, in addition to the Bible Study article, for the same reason.
- -On Thursday morning of last week the CHRIS TIAN-EVANGELIST special pulled out of this city over the C. B. & Q. road, with its goodly crowd of delegates bound for the Kansas City Convention. The number aboard was of course increased as the train proceeded on its way until the end of the journey was reached. It was not the writer's privilege to be aboard this train, but we saw them off in good shape and have no doubt of their good behavior and joyful associations throughout the trip. If anything in this world will cure a spell of the blues it is certainly the influence of a band of Christian men and women on their way to a great convention. Should this fail, however, the influence of the convention cannot. There is nothing so uplifting and belpful to a Christian as the atmosphere of a state or general convention of the Disciples of Christ. Christ is in their midst and this is why they are so happy.
- —A. McLean, Cor. Sec. Foreign Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio, dropped in on us last Thursday. While on his way to Kansas City he stopped over a day in St. Louis to attend some of the meetings of the American Board now in session in this city. He reports that three coaches loaded with delegates for the Kansas City Convention left Cincinnati over the B. & O. yesterday, while still others went over other lines.
- -Our brethren in the eastern states have decided to establish a seaside assembly resort near Ocean View, Delaware. The movement was endorsed by their recent convention in Baltimore and a company will be chartered under the laws of Delaware for carrying the plans into effect. The assembly grounds proper will comprise an auditorium and thirteen acres of ground suitably ornamented with trees, flowers, walks and other improvements. Adjoining this will be lots for cottages along boulevards and avenues. A steam or electric railway will connect the assembly grounds with Dagsboro, Delaware, while a steamer will ply between the grounds and Rehoboth. The company having the matter in charge has offered a premium of a choice lot to the person suggesting the best name for the beach, the matter to be decided by an impartial committee. This offer stands open until noon, November 1.

—Drop a postal card to the Christian Publishing Company and you will receive, free, a copy of the new General Catalogue, illustrated. It contains 100 pages, and is a handsome little book.

—The October magazine number of the Outlook contains a number of exceedingly interesting and valuable articles. Mr. Jacob Riis contributes an article upon Theodore Roosevelt, Sr., the father of Governor Roosevelt Dr. Tolman, Secretary of the League for Social Service, also has an illustrated article on Social Economics in the Paris Exposition. There is also a fine portrait of the Duke of Abruzzi, who has just surpassed Nansen's "Fartherest North" by reaching, with his polar expedition, the latitude 86° 36′. These are only a few of the very interesting features of this excellent number of the very valuable magazine. ($3 a year.) The Outlook Company, New York.

-The growth of the Church of Christ in Cedar Rapids has been so rapid that it has become necessary to divide; not a split over trouble but a peaceable division into two organizations, and this step was recently taken. A Second Christian Church now exists in Cedar Rapids, at the corner of 3rJ Ave., and 6th Street West, and of this event an extended account is given in the Cedar Rapids Republican. This article also gives an account of our people and especially of their rapid growth in Iowa. Among the preachers present at the organization of the Second Christian Church in Cedar Rap ds was Bro. Rudy, the present pastor of toe First Church, and N. S. McConnell, by whom the First Church was organized. Bro. McConnell preached the discourse at the organization of the Second Christian Church, which began with seventy charter members. After the discourse the scriptural officers were chosen to serve the new congregation. In all this work Bro. Rudy has also been one of the potent factors. Elder S. G. Griffith has been called to the first pastorate of the new Church and will begin work November 1. We wish both congregations and their pastors God-speed in their work. The First Church is a "living link" Church in the Foreign Society and missionary to the very core, and the Second Church will strive to be like unto it.

-One of the best stories published in recent years is "Shem," by J. Breckenridge Ellis, just issued by the Christian Publishing Co. It contains 299 pages. Price 50 cents.

—J. W. Allen, of 903 Adams St., Chicago, writes that their new church building will be dedicated on the first Lord's day in November. Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus Ind., is to be the chief speaker of the occasion, preaching morning and evening of that day. At three o'clock of that day there will be a union communion service of all the Chicago Churches of Christ, upon which occasion Dr. H. L. Willett is to be the chief speaker. The brethren hope to make that day one long to be remembered in the history of our work in that city. Arrangement will be made for the entertainment of any visiting brethren who may attend the dedication.

—The following item of news from The Advance's Michigan news column not only confirms our faith in the good motives which caused Brother McAllister to change his church and ministerial relations from the Congregational Church to the Disciples of Christ, but also shows that his action provoked no evil thoughts in the mind of the Church from which he separated himself:

Detroit.—Plymouth: At a recent meeting of the Church resolutions of sympathy, appreciation and regret regarding the resignation of the beloved pastor, Rev. James McAllister, were indorsed by a unanimous vote. He was commended to the churches as a man of pure and exalted character, an eloquent and gifted preacher and possessed of unusual social powers Mr. McAllister resigns on account of his wife's ill health.

Dersonal Mention.

C. P. Overstreet, of Chandler, Clay Co., Mo., would like to engage with some evangelist or church as a singer. He gives good references and we hope that he will soon hear a call.

Professor B. C. Deweene, of the Bible College, Lexington, Kentucky, will not be able to attend the National Convention in Kansas City on account of his wife's illness. We all regret both the fact and the cause of our brother's absence.

Henry S. Earl, of Irvington, Ind, purposes spending two or three months in evangelistic work in Oklahoma, commencing in the latter part of the present month. Churches desiring his services are requested to write to W. A. Humphrey, Guthrie, O. T.

Dr. W. T. Moore and S. D. Dutcher will dedicate the new church at Rush Hill, Mo., on the third Sudday in this month. S. D. Dutcher and W. G. Surber have just closed a short meeting at Auxwasse, Mo., resulting in 10 additions to the congregation.

T. Augustus Reid, General Secretary of the Colored Missionary Society and Principal of the High School, Maysville, Ky., called at this office on his way to the Kansas City Convention of our colored brethren and expressed his appreciation of the Christian-Evangelist.

Professors C. L. Loos and S. M. Jefferson, of Lexington, Ky., being delayed on their way to Kansas City, were thus afforded an opportunity to see the city of St. Louis in part and to call at the Christian Evangelist's headquarters. Notwithstanding the fact that these brethren failed to make close connection at Union Station, this city, they were both in a particularly fine humor and went on their way at 2 p. M., rejoicing.

J N Jessup, pastor First Christian Church, Little Rock, Ark., has completed another year of service. During the year there have been 66 additions to the church and $3,658 56 raised from all sources, of which $864.30 were given for benevolence and missions. The congregation sent Bro. Jessup to Kansas City as a delegate, at its own expense. The report throughout shows excellent work and a hopeful outlook for both pastor and church.

W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, Mo., has just entered upon his seventh year as pastor of the First Church of that city. A summary of his six years' work shows 594 additions to the membership of the congregation, and a net increase of 230. Present membership is 833 The church and its auxiliaries have raised, during this time, the sum of $56.099.31, of which amount $9,283.54 were given for missions, and $46,815.77 for local work and charity. All departments of the work seem to be in good and hopeful condition.

H. F. MacLane, of Toledo, O., is leaving his pastorate that he may give his time to evangelistic work. He says that he has a profound conviction that he can best serve the Master in the evangelistic field, although he is giving up his work in Toledo against the protest of the entire congregation which has doubled its membership under his ministry. He has time for a meeting of three weeks in December. Prof. C. E Millard will be his helper in song for the years 1900 and 1901. His address is 824 Norwood Ave., Toledo, O.

Ben F. Hill was hindered from attending the convention at Kansas City this week on account of the great interest awakened by his meeting in Union Star. He has 25 additions to date, and seven confessions Oct. 12. He can be had for a meeting elsewhere at the close of this meeting. His address is California, Mo. He was engaged for a meeting to follow this one, but the house is not completed yet and this opens the way for a meeting at some other point. The church that gets Bro. Hill is sure of a good meeting.

J. C. Coggins was recently installed as the pastor of the Christian Tabernacle, Decatur, Ill. The installation sermon was preached by Bro. George F. Hall, the former pastor of the church, who came down from Chicago to perform that office. There was a large congregation present at the morning service. Bro. Hall delivered one of his characteristic sermons, urging co-operation on the part or the people and the pastor as the only successful method of deriving the best results. He urged faithfulness on the part of the pastor and told the members that they should assist the pastor all in their power to make his work the most successful.

Gatarrh

The cause exists in the blood, in what causes inflammation of the mucous membrane.

It is therefore impossible to cure the disease by local applications.

It is positively dangerous to neglect it, because it always affects the stomach and deranges the general health, and is likely to develop into consumption

Many have been radically and permanently cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla. It cleanses the blood and has a peculiar alterative and tonic effect. R. Long, California Junction, Iowa, writes: "I had catarrh three years, lost my appetite and could not sleep. My head pained me and I felt bad all over. I took Hood's Sarsaparilla and now have a good appetite, sleep well, and have no symptoms of catarrh."

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Promises to cure and keeps the promise. It is better not to put off treatment—buy Hood's today.

Addison Clark.

Addison Clark, LL. D., was born in Titus coucty, Tex., Dec. 11, 1842,—the oldest of eight children. His father, a lawyer, editor and preach-r, at different times of his life, is still living at the age of 85. When the Civil War began the subject of this sketch was attending school at College Hill Institute, McKinney, Tex. He at once enlisted in the Confederate army as a private, but was afterward elected first sergeant, then lieutenant. He went through the war unhurt, and returaed home after the last egiment had been disbanded.

The next year he taught school and read law. Desiring to continue his education he entered Carlton College in 1867. In 1869 he married Miss Sallie McQuigg, the niece of Mrs Chas. Carlton, and moved to Ft. Worth. Here he taught school until 1873, when, in connection with his father and brother Randolph, he established Add-Ran College, at Thorp Spring. Of this institution he was the president for 26 years.

While in educational circles he is properly called the Thomas Arnold of Texas, he is also a preacher of great power. Every vacation has been spent in evangelistic work. With the exception of a visit to Missouri, also one to California, his preaching has all been done in Texas, where Gcd has given him a rich harvest of souls. While a man of great modesty, his influence is strongly marked at the deliberations of missionary conventions. The counsels of few men in Texas are respected as much as his.

Last summer Dr. Clark—or Bro. Addison, as he is everywhere known—gave up his work in the university of which he had been the central figure for so long. This action was against the vigorous protests of the trustees, faculty and students. As pastor of the Central Church in Waco, however, he continues his residence on University Heights, and is a familiar face on the campus. Every week he gives a chapel lecture to the students who deligh: to honor the quarter of a century's record of their favorite. He also lectures once a week to the Bible students.

Bro. Clark's life has been an exceedingly busy one. He has been a hard worker; but at the age of 57 his strength is unabated, and his spirits are as buoyant as in youth. No game of athletics on the campus tails of his presence, on which occasion none can equal him in healthy enthusiasm. He is progressive in spirit, liberal in his views, and has before him many of the best years of his life.

Among the names, sacred to whose memory stands the beautiful Home being erected for the young ladies of Add-Ran, will be that of Hetty D'Spain Clark, mother of Addison. His liberal gift to this enterprise shows his utter unselfishness, as well as the loyalty and love with which he remembers his mother. She died in 1895, and her body is resting in the little graveyard at Thorp Spring. To her, next to his Savior, Bro. Clark owes his spiritual manhood.

Athens of To-day.

If you have sailed from Constantinople in the evening, you will look from the port-hole of your cabin next morning upon the barren shores of the Dardanelles; and when you go on deck, after the coffee and rolls which serve as a pretext for postponing breakfast until eleven o'clock, you find your ship threading that strait which here separates one of the most arid corners of Europe from one of the dreariest bits of Asia. On both sides the land seems bare and baked. There are occasional lonesome looking villages along the shore, villages which seem to have no outlook upon the world, nothing of worth or interest within themselves, and no touch with civilization, except to see the ships go by which never stop. Some mysterious power must bind the inhabitants to their places, but perhaps it is only the power of habit and inheritance.

Both sides of the strait are the domain of the Sultan, and presently our boat, flying the British flag, drops anchor between two Turkish forts, while certain of the officers go ashore to get permission to proceed. All non-Turkish boats must do this. The Russian troop-ships which are now sailing from Odessa to China must do it.

An hour or two later the strait widens and we pass from the Dardanelles into the Ægean Sea, and all that day we sail under a bright sky among "the Isles of Greece, where burning Sappho loved and sung." These islands are so much a part of the real Greece, and the sea between them so vividly recalls that famous old race of sailors who lived nearly as much on the water as on the land, that one feels that he has already seen Greece before he has caught even a glimpse of the bold coast of its mountainous mainland.

There was full moon that night and our little company of shipmates, six people of five nationalities, sat so late on deck delighting in the vision of those islands and waters which of old had been known and loved of many heroes, that we were not out next morning until the rattle of the anchor-chains told us that we were lying in the habor of Piræus, now, as in the time of Pericles, the port of Athens.

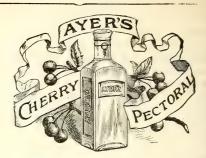

Here, as at Constantinople, we went ashore in row-boats, while hotel runners and tourist agents, with voices of tropical violence and manners notably devoid of classic repose, turned the morning calm into a bewildering din. We were told that if we presented our visiting cards to the customs officer, our baggage would not be opened. That seemed like a joke, but we tried it and it was even so. The officer bowed deferentially and we passed through with our baggage, while the others, who either didn't have cards or didn't know the trick, waited their turns to have their trunks and valises pulled to pieces. It seems that in Turkey the customs examination is a matter of private bribery between the traveler and the officer, while in Greece it is a social function where you leave cards.

The Attic plain, the dry, arid and comparatively treeless expanse in the middle of which lies Athens, is an isosceles triangle with its base on the sea and reaching north about ten miles. The width of the triangle is somewhat less. Athens lies nearer to the base than to the apex, and to the right (looking north) of the median line of the triangle, and the port Piræus is near the lower left-hand corner. The right side of the trlangle (still looking north, as one naturally does, approaching from the sea) is formed half by the mountain ridge of Hymettus, famous in ancient and modern times for its honey, and half by Mount Pentelicus, whose quarries of creamy marble furnished the material for the Parthenon and all the great buildings which were contemporary with it. Between these two runs the road which leads out to Marathon. The left leg of the triangle, also a high ridge, is broken near the middle by a gap which forms the pass through which run the ancient road and the modern railroad from Athens to Eleusis, famed for its Mysteries, and to

In this comparatively level plain, girt about by mountains and sea, rise two detached points of high ground; the Acropolis, five hundred feet high, with almost perpendicular walls except at the west end, roughly elliptical in shape with the long axls east and west, and having an area about equal to four city squares or perhaps more, and the sharp, conical peak of Lykabettos, lying a little beyond the Acropolis and to the right, a thousand feet high and capped with the quaint little Chapel of St. George. Ancient Athens lay all around the Acropolis, the modern city lies almost entirely on the north side and runs up on the lower slopes of Lykabettos.

It is a hot and dusty five-mile drive from Piræus up to Athens-hot even at seven o'clock in the morning. The road follows almost exactly the route of the Long Walls which used to connect Athens with her port, as it naturally would, for it is the straight and natural route. Even this hasty ride helps one to understand some things about Greek history. A glance at the mountain walls to right and left explains that isolation of city from city which always limited the scope of Greek patriotism to mere local pride. The barren soil insufficiently watered and burnt almost to brick under a blazing sun, explains the aversion of the Greeks to agriculture in both ancient and modern times. The presence of the olive tree, which alone among trees appears able to extract nourishment from the red soil of Attica, explains the sacredness of the olive to Athena. The proximity of the sea, with two good harbors and a multitude of sheltering islands, explains the fact that the Greeks became a seafaring people. The presence of a mountain of marble and the absence of timber tells why they became builders in stone rather than in wood.

Athens is, perhaps, the most modern of Greek towns, just as Rome is, with the exception of Milan and Turin, the most modern of Italian cities. Both of these classic cities, in their comparatively recent capacity of national capitals, have been thoroughly rebuilt. Indeed, Athens less than a century ago was nothing but a dirty village of a couple of dozen houses, and it was made the capital of independent Greece solely in the hope that the luster of its name might be lent to the new kingdom and might strengthen both its prestige abroad and its unity at home. So, really, it was the ancient name which was chosen as the capital and the city was built to order afterward. The city is therefore regularly laid out and has no flavor of antiquity about it except as certain ruins are preserved here and there and as classic models

The great trouble in trying to sell what are called patent medicines is that so many claims have been made for them that people don't or won't believe what honest makers say.

We have been telling our story sixty years. Did we ever deceive you once? If we make any statement that isn't so, we will stand the loss. Go to the druggist and get your money back.

Here's an example. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is a good cure for a cough that comes from a cold. Your cough, if you have one, may not come from a cold; your doctor will tell you about that.

It is a straight medicine with sixty years of cures back of it. There isn't a ghost of the ordinary patent thing about it.

Still, the city itself is fall of interest. One who has ever been interested in Greek literature cannot look unmoved upon street-signs and advertisements in that c'assic tongue, and the fig-vender's lusty cry of "See-ka, seeka, seeka" has a sweetness more sweet than the fruit itself. The thought that the morning papers, of which the "Daily Acropolis" was my favorite, with all their telegraphic dispatches from China and South Africa, were in a language which, in spite of a few syntactical alterations and a few modern words for modern things, would have been entirely intelligible to Plato, was always an awing reflection which made me look reverently upon the passing throng. My peddler of figs, with his tasseled cap, his short accordeon-pleated white skirt and rosettes upon the turned-up points of his shoes, could read the tragedies of Æschylus as I read Shakespeare; though the changed pronunciation of modern Greek would interfere with conversation between Pericles and the man of figs, even if the bar of centuries were removed.

Starting out for a walk or a drive in Athens, there are a score of routes but only one destination—the Acropolis. Beginning at the Place de la Constitution, where the best hotels are, one may take a glance across the Square at the palace of King George, the Danish King of Greece, and then stroll down Hermes Street, the central thorughfare of the city; pass by the quaint little old yzantine church which stands in the middle of ne street and still is not large enough to block turn a square to the left to see the gaudy big ew cathedral and the exquisite little old one; ass on through the market-place, where the male ational costume (ballet-dancer's skirts, white runk hose and embroidered zouave jacket) may ill be seen, though it is gradually disappearing om the cities; past the old agora, where a few tanding columns and many prostrate in an enlosure tell of the commercial life of ancient thens; up the street to the old round Tower of ne Winds; then through the tortuous foot paths hich creep precariously along the slope at the oot of the precipitous north cliff of the Acropos; until finally the west gate of the Acropolis is eached. Or one may continue on down Hermes treet clear to the other end of the town, where he ancient funeral monuments line the old road, ke the tombs along the Appian Way, and come ack by the perfectly preserved Temple of heseus and the Hill of Mars.

Mars Hill is a mere bump of rock on the sloping restern approach of the Acropolis. It affords a erfect view of the city and especially of the gora which lay just below it, so that, when Paul poke of the altar which he had seen as he passed hrough the market-place, his auditors could turn heir heads and see it. The ruthless iconoclasm f the guide-book suggests that Paul's speech was robably not delivered on the Areopagus, or Hill f Mars, but in the place of business of the reopagites in the market. I was pleased to find hat the accepted view is approved by an authority Prof. Mahaffy) whose word on such matters is unter as unimpeachable as that of the omniscient saedeker.

Of other routes to the Acropolis, there are lenty, but perhaps they may best be taken for ranted. But the best of them all is that which eads past the royal gardens, near the scant emains of the Temple of Olympian Zeus, past the tadion where the ancient races and games were seld, through intricate streets to the exquisite ittle Choragic monument of Lysicrates, around the outhern side of the Acropolis, past the Theatre of Dionysus, where the works of the great tragic and omic poets were first presented, and the Odeion or music hall) of the Roman period, and so up to he same west gate, which is the only gate the Acropolis has. In the old Theatre, by the way, the front row of marble seats was set aside for the priests and each seat bears the carved name of ts occupant—an ingenuous method of dealing with the matter of clerical hostility to the drama.

When one undertakes to write about the Acropolis of Athens, he may write a calm, descriptive book about it, or he may rave up to the limit of his space. To be at once sane and brief on this sabject, without being criminally commonplace, is, I suppose, impossible. I visited the Acropolis every day I was in Athens; in the words of Cyrano, "Tous les jours-deux fois;" by morning light, when the city still lay in the shadow of Hymettus, but very much asive because it was yet cool; at midday, when the Attic Plain lay breathless with the heat, and the city slept as soundly as at midnight, and when, drowsing in the shade of a Doric pillar, one could dream half-waking dreams, which were, after all, quite as true and adequate and edifying as the more rational reflections of one's waking hours; by sunset, when the yellow marble of those ruined temples was all turned to pure gold, as no Midas could ever turn it; by moonlight, when the present seemed unreal and modern Athens an unplausible myth, and only the ancient world, with its heroic names and its wildest fairy tales, seemed real and true. Some day perhaps the impression of The Praise Hymnal

"Last October the church in this city purchased 150 copies of the 'Praise Hymnal,' and everybody is delighted with them. Since we have had them we have introduced the responsive reading of the Scriptures, very admirable selections from the Psalms and portions of the New Testament, comprising the first 64 pages of the book, and the morning worship of our church has been greatly improved. The selection of hymns, both old and new, can hardly be improved. The general make-up of the book is the best. We cordially recommend the 'Praise Hymnal' to all churches contemplating the purchase of new hymn books.

the Acropolis by moonlight may be expressed in music, but in words never.

When one has climbed up, by the winding carrriage road or by one of the many foot-paths, to the west gate, called the Beule Gate, of the Acropolis, and has passed through this narrow opening in the strong stone wall, he is confronted by a broad, steep and somewhat irregular stairway, partly of marble blocks and partly cut from the living rock. To the right on a projecting spur stands the little Temple of Wingless Victory, a tiny building, smaller than the smallest conceivable church, but exquisite in symmetry and ornament, and well rebuilt from the original fragments which were found scattered about. At the top of the broad stairway, perhaps seventy-five feet above the little lower gate, stands the manypillared Propylæa, or great gateway, in itself a vast and impressive edifice. Passing through one of its three spacious doors one comes out upon the level top of the great rock.

As the reader, doubtless, very well remembers the Acropolis, which was in the very earliest times the entire site of the settlement which developed into Athens, was soon given over entirely to the temples of the gods. Warfare and business and the daily life of the people were relegated to the plain. The Acropolis was for worship, and the great day of the year was the day when the Panathenean procession, with all the dignitaries of the state and all the priests and garlanded victims for sacrifice, wound its way up from the city and through the marble portals to the temples on the Acropolis. It was this procession which formed the subject of the greatest work of ancient art, the sculptured frieze of the Parthenon.

Of all these many buildings, only four retain enough of their former glory to be ever recognizable. Two have already been mentioned. The other two are the Erechtheion and the Parthenon. Both are unroofed and but fractions of their walls are standing. But the Erechtheion has its charming Porch of the Maidens and the Parthenon has, besides its original marble floor, one entire pediment and enough of the vast Doric columns which compassed it about to give it still the form of a temple. It is distressing to reflect that this best of all specimens of Greek architecture was nearly perfect so late as two centuries ago and that its ruin was wrought not by the tooth of time but by the wrath of man and modern gunpowder. Let us not here raise again the interminable dispute over the right and wrong of Lord Elgin's theft of the frieze for the British

I had heard much, as everyone has, of the grandeur of proportions and perfection of form of these ruins, but no one had ever told me what a feast of color they presented. It is the characteristic of Pentelic marble that it soon turns to a creamy yellow and then to a golden brown. The Greeks, who painted and gilded their statues and stone buildings to avoid that dazzling whiteness which we think of as strictly classic, must have had great delight in this marble, which does not become weather-stained but instead takes on a mellow ripeness. The pigment and the gilding are gone now, but twenty centuries have deepened the rich hue of the marble until now it seems not to have been hewn from a ledge of stone but quarried from a gold mine-or from a sunset.

There were few stops in my journey from Athens to New York. The distance was covered in sixteen days, twelve of which were occupied by the long sea voyage from Naples, past the shores of Sardinia, stopping a few hours at Gibraltar, where one sees the last touch of orientalism—Moors and Algerians jostling with khaki-clad English soldiers and mantilla-veiled senoras—and passing so close to the Azores Islands that mail is dropped from the steamer in a sealed box.

It has been an interesting and diversified trip, this journey around the edges and corners of Europe, by way of Paris, North Cape, Moscow, Constantinople and Gibraltar. Sometimes it was luxurious travelling, sometimes otherwise, but always interesting and worth the doing. The impulse of the traveller is not unlike that of Kipling's globe-trotter who puts his passion for change into these words:

"It's like a book, I think, this bloomin' world, Which you can read and care for just so long, But presently you feel that you will die Unless you get the page you're readin' done, And turn another—likely not so good; But what you're after is to turn 'em all."

It is not all ease and luxury, this thing of circling around a continent, through Paris, civilized and sinful; through Lapland, savage and simple; through Greece, classic and radiant, but it involves the turning of many pages in that "bloomin' book" of human experience.

Correspondence.

English Topics.

The sweet English summer is waning. There is in the air a plaintive murmur pitched in the music of the minor mode, so dear to the more sentimental of the musicians and the poets. Before I write the next of these letters the beautiful "hirundines," which the old Romans so much admired, will begin to gather about the ancient gray towers of our country parish churches, and will be circling in their preluding flights ere migrating in millions to the lands of the far south. The first touches of autumn are tinting the leaves, and the swallows will take the hint and plume their wings for the farewell to Britain. And other flights are being witnessed. The visitors to England, France, Germany and Switzerland are massing in battalions in London while arranging to sail for America. This has been a great American year on this side. We hope that the numbers who will come next year will be even larger. Come and inaugurate the 20th century amongst us.

THE CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

An expected event seems to rush in and to rush out again with breathless speed. The annual Assembly of the Christian Association of Great Britain took place last week in Liverpool. As I presided at the meetings my profound interest in all that ensued may be considered excusable. This was the 20th annual conference. You in America usually call a convention what we style a conference. This was the largest attended conference we have had. But for the first time we were altogether without the pleasure of American visitors. I wondered why this should be so, as this year we have been privileged to receive in our homes and our pulpits so very many welcome American guests. Most of those who would have been interested in the conference had, I suppose, aleady gone across the Atlantic. But after all we did enjoy the presence of a few American friends. But these were missionaries who happen at this moment to be in this country and who made a point of being at the Liverpool gathering. And never have we heard any finer speeches than those given by Bros. Ware and McGavran. Each of these has been preaching in my own pulpit. I never miss the opportunity of catching a live missionary and placing him in evidence before my congregation. That is the way to train a missionary people. Next week Ware and McGavran and their wives are sailing for China and India respectively. They seem to be hungering for the opportunity of resuming their beloved missions. They seem to be in fine health and ardent expectations of success.

THE CONFERENCE CLIMACTERIC.

Undoubtedly at our Liverpool meeting the climax was the session of the C. W. B. M. The public meeting was presided over by Mrs. J. Coop. It was at this particular meeting that Ware and Mc-Gavran made their speeches. But this was not all. Bro. John Johnson, from Smyrna, also spoke. He unconsciously showed up much of the romantic side of foreign missionary life and work, coming as he did from the glowing and fascinating Near East. I have known and admired J. Johnson for several years. I must say that I never expected this simple, plodding, Yorkshire man to become a missionary to foreign parts. He is a transformed man. He has developed powers of an altogether unexpected character. Consecration works marvels in the personality of any man or woman. So, however. does matrimony. And this good brother, who was a shy and timid sort of celibate when he went out to Aleqandria, having met with his predestined feminine affinity, suddenly realized the truth of the ancient inspired dictum that it was not good for a man to be alone. He married a lady engaged in mission hospital work. At that time he was in the service of the society known as the "North Africa Mission," but when A. M'Lean was in Alexandria, he proposed that this brother should enter our work at Smyrna. I have met with no man in any part of our great field more enthusiastic or more ardently longing to return to the work than J. Johnson. His mission is specially to the Armenians in and around Smyrna, although he addresses his efforts also to Greeks and Turks. While I write he is about sailing from Glasgow for Asia

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Arrangements are being made to transfer certain preachers in this country to other posts, by way of exchange. These preachers have been very steadfastly abiding at their respective positions for several years. Changes are at times expedient. It is proposed by our board in England to transfer Rapkin from Margate to Birkenhead; Brearley from Birkenhead to Fulham and McKenzie from Fulham to Margate. These alterations are calculated to bring good results. The majority of our preachers desire to remain where they are. The most prosperous of our churches during the past year is Liverpool. Bro. Bicknell, aided by a model wife for a pastor, has captivated not only that one difficult church, but also many of the Liverpool people outside. A few of our churches have failed to make progress during the year; but they have done well before and will do well again. It seems to be the general feeling that the war fever has diminished popular ardor in higher enterprises: and I fear that this is a fact. I am a fervent hater of war, and that is why I have been sometimes a puzzle to readers of these letters, when I have saddled the Boers with the blame of provoking the fearful conflict which has cost Britain and Africa many thousands of precious lives. It is curious that some of us who plead that Britain never prepared for this bloody strife and that she did nothing to induce it, are misunderstood and misrepresented as if we actually approved of the war. No! No! We have won; but we hate the war with a pure and perfect and passionate hatred, and we despise and execrate the cruel ambition of that sham little Napoleon, Paul Kruger, whose mock pretence of a pure love of independence has not only bewitched the Dutch in great numbers, but has also misled the judgment of many of the ablest Americans.

WILL PEACE COME?

No! Be not deceived. The world is not at all preparing for a pacific era. The role of the prophet is one I have never assumed; but for once I will venture to practice a little vaticination. We shall, of course, be able to subdue all the recalcitrant elements in South Africa. The talk about the still further duration of the Boer war and the heroic potentialities of the guerilla bands, is simply silly. The Boers are farmers. They are not brigands. They will settle sulkily down. Having deliberately, though madly, appealed to arms and defied in their blind bigotry and conceit a vast empire, they have to take the consequences, now that they have rulned their country. The British will not permit secession, any more than would you Americans, when the South rebelled. The consequences had to be endured by the rebels. But the Boers will enjoy perfect home rule, under the British flag. They will possess more liberty than before, excepting that they will be deprived of the liberty to take away the liberties of other people. such as Kastirs and Outlanders. But I am thinking at this moment more of another part of the world. My mind is concentrated on China. I predict that, unless Russia, Germany and America modify their present resolutions, in a few months a war will break out which will wrap two hemispheres in flames. Russia knows her own mind, but she is in a diabolical mood, studying her own aggrandiz ment in the most shamefully selfish manner. The Kaiser is pursuing the pathway to revenge. Ame ica is intent on accommodating the policy of the hour to exigencies at home, without regard more than the bearings of the issues on the po tical elections. Britain is paramount in the va center of China. Her trade dominates the who of the great Yangtse Valley, and she will be force to act alone, sooner or later, unless Germany an America fall into line with her. This, Russia wi attempt to prevent. Japan will do her utmost t thwart Russia. Unless America takes couns with Britain and agrees to stand together with he in some bold attitude that will overawe the selfiand unscrupulous Russian bureaucrats. I think it clearly to be foreseen that before twelve month have passed, we English will have an enormor fleet massed in Chinese waters, and we shall be transferring most of our half million men now South Africa to China. It appears to me from my reading of the American papers that the American people do not at all see the continger cies ahead. For want of prevision they may a last be dragged into a tremendous conflict which timely interposition on the side of Britain would prevent. I do not believe that we have pacif prospects before us, but I incline to the opinion sadly and reluctantly, that Russia, Germany France, Britain and America are going to be fear fully punished for their joint complicity in th cowardly policy which left the Suitan free fo two years to slaughter Armenian Christians, unt about 100,000 of that beautiful Eastern commu nity perished at the hands of the butcher of th Bosporus. The retribution has already begun and it will be hastened by the folly of worldly wise statesmen who are now going to dream idl of coming peace. Chicago Letter.

The hosts are pressing on to Kansas City. I D. Power, Bishop of Washington, passed throug Chicago last week, headed for Estherville, lowe From this place he was to go to Hannibal, Mo., t preach Sunday, and then on to Kansas City. Bro Power is looking hale and happy, as if continen wide usefulness agrees with him. R. M. Bolton formerly of New England, but now of Findlay, O preceded him by twenty-four hours. Bro. Bolto will visit in Missouri and Iowa after the conver tion. Why not hold him with one of our wester churches, as a hostage? Alex. McMillan is als on the wing. He will take whatever time is nec essary to close up the secretarial work in Michigan and then has his heart set on returning to th pastorate The writer of this letter stands read to wouch for Bro. McMillan's good looks, and tha is one quality sure to please at least part of th sermon-tasting church.

J. C. Wayman, one of the saints of Chicago spent Sunday, Oct. 7th, in Milwaukee, visiting th church there, of which he was a charter member C. M. Kreidler, the new pastor, preached his fire sermons and pleased everybody. The Milwauke church has had sixteen years of hard sledding but is coming rapidly to the front. In three o four weeks they will enter their new $17,00 building, every brick of which is paid for, wit only $2,400 on the lot. They have no debt for current expenses. Above all, they have show their wisdom by calling a pastor without putting him "on trial." Bro. Kreidler was well recom mended by those in whom they had confidence and that was enough. They called him, and h has gone to work and they are happy. To ever pastorless church I say, "Go thou and do like #ise.

It is saying a great deal for a State Convention to say that it met in Bloomington, Ill., with th irch of which J. H. Gilliland is pastor. In ny respects, if not in all, this church and pasare models. It did your heart good to note fine thoughtfulness that had provided in vance for every need of delegates and visitors. roughout the entire convention, there was the auty of exterior decoration, and the beauty of monious movement. Oct. 1-4 is several weeks the past, but it will long wield its wholesome luence upon the future in Illinois. Who there esent will attend the second semi-centennial? the way, the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST did a gracething in lending us W. W. Hopkins for a lece. He was, as usual, original, up-to-date and piring. His pamphiet, "Public and Private ghts," ought to be read by every preacher and lizen.

Chicago churches are singing the same old ng, "O wait and murmur not" It seems to ve a familiar sound, as if one had heard it elseere-in St. Louis, for instance, or San Fran-FRANK G. TYRRELL. sco or New York. 4957 Prairie Ave.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

There are twenty-four congregations of Disples of Christ in Chicago. Ten years ago there ere four such churches, seven years ago there ere six. The aggressive policy inaugurated with e advent of E. W. Darst was not a mistake. esults up to date demonstrate the wisdom of e policy. There is a good congregation in vanston, a part of Chicago, I believe, which susins its pastor, W. E. Payne, pays hall rent, and ad a good meeting not long since, conducted by J. Spencer, of Lexington, Ky. And besides all is it has money in its treasury, and more than 100 in bank, to the credit of a building fund. he Irving Park Church, I am informed, has a eautiful lot and a comfortable house of worship, cactically free from debt. The congregation at est Pullman owns a house on which there is a nall debt. Hyde Park has a house sufficient for resent needs, on which there is an indebtedness t, I think, about $2,000. Four years ago the yde Park congregation was receiving assistance rom the American Christian Missionary Society t the rate of $700 a year. The house of worhip was built without the assistance of the hurch Extension Board, and cost about $7,000. ast year this church gave more to missions than ny other congregation of Disciples in the city of hicago. The Hyde Park congregation is our Iniversity Church. Dr. E. S. Ames is entering on is work as pastor of this congregation with the earty support of the membership. The outlook s encouraging. Austin, Humboldt Park, Douglass ark and Ashland Avenue Churches are ready, I ear, to begin the erection of houses of worship. The First Church, the congregation of which F. G. 'yrrell was pastor up to the first of October, darfield Park Church, a congregation at the corner of Fifty-third and Halsted Street, and the Keeley street Mission, pay their own rent and have egular preaching. Besides the congregations here named there are three missions with Sundaychools and now and again preaching. J. W. Allen is again with the West Side Church, where he served so many years as pastor. The indebtedness of this old congregation has been largely reduced and it is now completing a fine house of worship. The Monroe Street Church is free from debt and the congregation is at work in a quiet way raising a building fund. A better house is needed. The North Side Church, the congregation of which W. B. Taylor has been pastor for a number of years, is making a heroic effort to pay off $6,000 of its indebtedness. Bro. Taylor speaks hopefully of the result. If $6,000 can be raised this church will be practically free from debt. It owns property the income from which will pay the interest on the remaining indebtedness. It is probable that W. B. Taylor will become superintendent of Chlcago City Missionsthe position held by E. W. Darst until ill health compelled him to give it up. The Central Church is so burdened with debt that the outlook is far from encouraging. The organized mission work of the Disciples of Christ in Chicago began the year $1,400 in debt, it will close the year free from debt and with money in the treasury. The churches that have built have done so without the aid of any of our missionary organizations. There is now a building syndicate composed of 100 people who agree to give five dollars apiece for every church built under the direction of the City Mission Board. The Englewood Church, long served in the pastorate by N. S. Haynes, located at the corner of Sixty-fourth Street and Eggles on Avenue, mov s on in the even tenor of its way under the oversight of C. G. Kindred. Do you not feel encouraged as you run over these factsencouraged concerning our work in Chicago?

To believe in God is to believe in men. Faith in the Christ requires faith in those for whom the Christ laid down his life. The unbeliever in God, in the Christ, in the Bible and in the Church, as a rule, has no faith in men. He believes, or professes to believe, that every man has his price, that every woman can be bought. This is the rule. To cultivate faith in God let us cultivate confidence in our fellows. The man who, by word or act, seeks to destroy mutual confidence among men, is using his influence to destroy faith in God and in his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. This is a fact. Beware of words the tendency of which is to undermine faith. Jesus believed in men. If he had not had faith in men he would not have come to earth to save men from their

Here are words which I find in one of our Church papers written by a man of whom I have heard it said: "He is an infidel!" The article has no signature, but I happen to know the author. Read the following:

"We cannot begin to understand this nineteenth century religious reformation, unless we take into account above all its unswerving loyalty to the word of God. . . . This trait, more than almost any other, has characterized our movement. It has given us a high level of Christian intelligence; it has furnished us with numerous lay preachers, who have won souls and built churches; it has saved us from clericalism; it has given us the congregational polity; it has made and kept us free. . . This reverence for divine revelation has made all our thinking and teaching Christo-centric. Wherever a group of Disciples are gathered, Christ is in the midst. Our preaching has exalted him; our personal work has been an effort to bring souls to him; our missionary societies have sprung out of a determination to obey his command to disciple all nations; our schools and colleges are so many attempts to give fuller effect to his teachings, and our hospitals and orphanages are honest efforts to continue his tender ministries."

Do you think that the man who writes in this strain is disloyal to "our plea?" Is he an infidel? B. B. T.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING CO.

Disseminating Error by Denuncia-

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON:—I want to thank you for your editorial on Mr. Allen's book, "The Reign of Law." I admire the sweet spirit with which you noticed it. It seems to me to be a book whose sceptical ideas are much weaker than Robert Elsmere, and whose characters are too weakly drawn for an author of note. His hero, David, seems to have made too much progress in a few months, from a plain country boy with no talent to a philosoper of some investigation, to have much effect on the reader. The love story seems to be tacked on to it like a tail to a kite, "to make it go."

To me the purpose of the author seems purposeless, unless it be to cast reflection upon religion. However, I can but fe-l that there is a lesson in the background. The first questioning of David's mind was suggested by the bigoted sermons of his pastor, who set out to demolish the sects, and upon their ruips to build up his own. David, as any honest man, would naturally want to hear the others for himself. He heard and was con vinced, as his great-grandfather before him, that his Caurch had not monopolized all the piety. Lesson: Preach the truth, let the sects alone. If "the truth is mighty it will prevail."

The preacher who comes to the pulpit with denunciation for higher criticism and the other bypaths of theology, will feed his flick on "husk," a food on which sheep will starve. There are men who are naturally liberal, that will hear both sides of a question, and if they are sent by the preacher's suggestion to study these things, as this David, they will find some good, lose confidence in the preacher's honesty or ability, and accept much that is false. Then comes the crisis, when the mind in the process of development begins to question, then if the paster is not a man of deep sympathy to help the doubter, he will drive him farther away.

No thinking man but at some time has had his doubts. Our college pasters often make the mistake of referring to these questions continually. If they would preach on fou dation principles they would give the young man strength to overcome doubt when presented. Soldiers receive strength for battle by proper drilling and not by denouncing the enemy. The best cook-books are filled with receipes for wholesome food and not with essays on poisonous products. I have heard men denounce higher criticism, when to my certain knowledge they had never read a single standard work on the subject. Then thinking men want to know more about these auful evils.

Many read infidel books who never dreamed of them until they were denounced by the preacher. I recently knew an undergraduate to preach a trial sermon on Infidelity and Is There a God? His effort was to combat scepticism and he must necessarily refer to some leading infidels and their writings. You can easily see that doubt was suggested to thinking young men and they would want to know more of these men and their writings. I put $25 in a set of books last winter because a college professor denounced them as being dangerous. I wanted to taste of the "forbidden fruit."

If we preachers would feed our flock on wholesome food and direct their thoughts in the proper channels, there would be no need of denouncing books and sects. I believe we would have but little t ouble with sceptical tendencies and unruly members.

Bolton's Notes By the Way.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—We have re-located at Findlay, O. Near this city father located on a farm fifty-three years ago. Near here I spent my school days, taught school and began to teach the word of life, and in the city I organized a Church of God, of which I served as pastor six years. In and around this gas and oil city live one sister, two brothers, wife's sister, and two married daughters and families. Hence, it feels home-like.

On account of ill health we retired from the active ministerial work. But our physician here gives me encouragement that I can be helped, so as still to do more or less work for the blessed Master. This we greatly desire. May the Lord thus order it.

On Lord's day, September 2, we had an addition to the Church at Le Roy, Pa. A sister came from the M. E. Church, bringing her letter.

On Lord's day, September 9, spoke farewell words. It was a saddening occasion. We severed, perhaps no more to meet on earth. We enjoyed a plea ant, but brief, pastorate. Many good brethren and sisters are here, but falling health caused us to resign the charge. While here we had seven additions and fair prospects for an ingathering when special meetings would be held, which we had proposed to do if we had remained.

Lord's day night, of September 9, we spoke at Alba, Pa. Bro. R. E. Pope, formerly of Massachusetts, is pastor here. He has been here but a brief time. We helped him out of Methodism into the Church of Christ when we labored as pastor at Everett, Mass. Our stay here was enjoyable with this companionable family.

We next halted at the famous Niagara Falls, the greatest and grandest waterfall on earth. We forbear description, as it has been so frequently and ably described by the numerous pens in the past.

When we reached Findlay, our daughters, with their families, were assembled and we had a beautiful family reunion, and the physical fared sumptuously, as well. It appeared like olden days. Many changes have taken place, yet we love the "Old Home." Many are no more. Some have gone to the realms of the blest.

Church of Christ is large here and is faithfully at work, led on by a faithful and eloquent minister, in the person of Bro A. V. Growden. Our children are in the Church of Christ. This gives joy to their parents. If well enough expect to be at the National Convention. We greatly desire to attend it.

About Country Churches.

My friends who read the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST remember that I gave up regular preaching at the close of the World's Fair. I then came back to Ohio and devoted two whole years to getting health enough to be comfortable. Then I became a farmer, with strength enough to work myself miserable every day But I have had some regular preaching and the privilege of attending an occasional convention, and these compensate somewhat for the lonesomeness of such a retired life. Health and other circumstances have not yet so combined as to let me again into the min istry.

I expect to learn as long as I live. And farm life is not devoid of many lessons. There is complaint everywh re that country churches are going down, and that unsociability and selfishness are prevailing to an alarming extent. I have some reason to believe this is true, and have sought the cause of it.

Social deterioration is attributed to our school system by some. Children graduated from the courtry schools finish their preparatory education in the town schools. This soon centralizes social interests in the towns. Parents attend town churches to please the children, and a country church languishes and also the form social customs of the country.

It is well known, too, that for several years t farmer's lot has not been an easy one. His c penses have increased with all worldly progre while his receipts have not kept abreast the tim by reason of low prices. His effort to keep has taxed both himself and wife to the utmest their ability. They have not had time to maints social customs. On the Lord's day they are t tired to go to church, especially if "there is not ing but social meeting." Social and spiritu coldness is but the natural consequence. It tak a special and continuous effort to resist il tendency.

My experience in country life convinces me the what I say is true, at least in Onio. I have learn here what I did not know so well when I was regular pastor. If ever I preach again and mo as preachers ido, I shall feel for my country paishioners as I did not before. If they are late Sunday-school and church I shall think of the hudred things that may have hindered them. The ought to sleep as late Sunday morning as any of else. But they can not, and often they rise ear and work hard and are tired and dull at churservices.

Another thing I have heard, that many zerous preachers would not do as well as their merbers if they were compelled to a similar lift salary and all, and I partly believe it, yes, I part feel it. Perhaps many men do not know the ispiring power of salary and mistake this for spirit Many people believe this is actually so. I whall my preaching brethren would avoid all cause for suspicion in this respect.

Not long ago a generous o'd brother said to m
"I will never give another cent to educate preacers." His reason was that so many were noworthy men. He named such a list of men andeeds as discouraged me. An old lady said: "seems that every preacher we get is worse that the former." I don't believe all I hear about preachers, for other folks have failings as we but I do wish there were no occasion for spealing ill of ministers. Brethren, a preacher shoul be an example, (1) In word, (2) In manner of life (3) In love, (4) In faith, (5) In purity. (5) Tim. 4:12.)

A physician in McDade, Tex., who cured hin self by the use of Grape-Nuts food, says: "L grippe left me a physical and nervous wreck, wit indigestion, dilated stomach, constipation and net rasthenia. I tried electricity, vapor baths, traveling, camping and medicines, ad nauseum.

"Finally I put myself on Grape-Nuts food an before the first package was gone, I made such a improvement that it seemed difficult to believe. finally got to carrying Grape Nuts in my valise and in my pocket when I didn't have a valise Yesterday I secured a new case of two dore packages.

"The facts are that I could eat, and did eat digest and assimilate the food and gained remark ably in strength. I am now regularly attending to my practice. New Mexico as a Mission Field.

New Mexico in area is an empire. In popula tion she is rapidly filling with an energetic, progressive, intelligent population. Our business men are of first-class ability Go into any assembly and you will imagine yourself in a representative gathering of our central states. They are here from everywhere. They are out of their old-time environment and free to hear and consider the gospel pla as never before. Face them with reason and they are ready to respond. The people respect religion and are ready to hear a man who has something to say.

In all this territory we have but three or four weak congregations. The one at Roswell is the strongest, about 200 members, and the only one with regular preaching. The writer has been enabled to give himself to the work here by the General Board. In the last year we have paid $1,800 of debts, and are planning to pay the remaining $1,000 to the Extension Board during this year. We will then be self-sustaining and the help given this place may be appropriated to some other. Besides, this will be a strong missionary center of infl ence. We gave $50 to missions last year. We more than met our apportionment for Foreign Missions the first Lord's day in March. We will do as well next Lord's day for Home Missions. What the churches give us will soon be paid back with interest. But there are a dozen fields just as needy and just as fruitful. I know of at least four cities where an appropriation of $600 to each, with what could be raised on the ground, would establish strong churches in one or two years. Will not some of the Missouri breth en or churches who know me respond to this app-al by sending Bro. Smith assurance of support for a man in this promising field? The harvest is white, will you not both pray and pay that laborers may be sent into it at

What a joy it would be to some rich man or some rich church throughout eternity to know that you have been instrumental in establishing one church that will go on in the work of gathering redeemed souls into the Lord's garner, when you are slient in death. Do not neglect the offering for Home Missions. S. K. HALLAM.

The Preacher and the Congregation.

1. The preacher should be called by the congregation as d should be as nearly as possible acceptable to all who are old enough to understand the needs of the congregation. Hundreds of children (in the beginning of this reformation little children were not taken into the congregation as members as they are now) who ar - members of the church have no just conception as to the work of the ministry. He should be an earnest man, an honest man and a devoted man in his calling, understanding Moses and the Prophets so as to comprehend Jesus and His apostles. His sermons will then be full of the Spirit and edifying to his congregation. He must know what the gospel is that Paul preached and preach no other gorpel, but teach all things commanded of Jesus to all classes in due season. He will need much time to reflect on what he has been called to do, and to study well the word before appearing in the pulpit. Must not display himself but stand behind Jesus when speaking to the congregation.

2. The congregation will be able to determine his qua'ifications from his sermons and the elders (I do not mean the official board but the older persons who are Bible students) can easily discover the impressions and wishes of all by freely communicating with the members and thus, without taking an official vote, arrive at a fair conclusion as to the acceptability to the congregation of the minister whose claims may be before the church. There is now as in the days of Moses the tribe of Jannes and Jambres, and Hymenæus and Philetus in Paul's day. This tribe is always in the church as private members, in the official board and among the preachers. Avoid the tribe as much as possible. Do not ask or expect the preacher to do much visiting, as this is found, in these days, not so profitable as are good, sound and educational sermons Sunday morning and evening. Let the church house be the place for meeting each other on the first day and never leave without speaking to each other and the preacher. If his sermon is good tell him so and it will be better the next Sunday. Never speak in disrespect of the preacher nor of the sermon if you hope for good results. Tell him to his face what you have to say about his teaching. Invite your neighbor to meeting with you. Pay into the treasury as the Lord has prospered you and thus enable the deacons to pay the minister his earnings each week. Never call a preacher until you are ready. Do not call any one because he has offered to work for less than another. Let ability and qualification rule in your selection. Then see to it that all work as one man and the truth will be magnified. Tie up to no creed, written or unwritten. The Bible is the rule book.

Our Twentieth Century Fund.

We are receiving a great many responses to the appeal sent out in the interest of our endowment movement. There is no work in the Church that deserves a more hearty support than does the work of our Orphans' Home. There are but few families but what could care for one child. However, they do not care to have the responsibility of rearing the child, hence the need of an Orphans' Home. Without any responsibility whatever, they can now care for just as many orohan children as they may see fit. One thou sand dollars put into this Endowment Fund will take care of one child continually. Five thousand dollars will take care of five children. There is no better use to which you can put your money than to give a thousand dollars or five thousand dollars to this Home, and thus not only bless from one to five orphan children, but also be "laying up treasures in heaven, where moth and rust doth not corrupt nor thieves break through and steal."

If you are able to give a thousand dollars don't ease your conscience by giving fifty or a hundred dollars, but give as the Lord has prospered you. We trust that every preacher who reads this will place the need of our Orphans' Home before his congregation. If we raise the fifty thousand dollars, we must have the co operation and support of the ministers of the Church. We are confident that there are many in every congregation that would be glad to give to this noble institution if the matter were properly placed before them. We do not ask you to take up a collection unless you see fit to do so, but only ask that you inform the people with whom you come in contact of the needs and aims of our Orphans' Home. Some in your congregation may be able to give a thousand dollars, some a hundred and some may not be able to give more than twenty five or one dollar. Whatever the amount is, it will be gratefully received. We are making a great effort to raise ten thousand dollars by January 1st. Will you not join us in this campaign, that we may raise the required amount?

The Monroe Convention was a good one. The attendance was about the usual number and the interest most excellent. The plan of work was somewhat changed. Hereafter the secretarial work will be done by one of the pastors, and the state missionary will be given more time for protracted meetings.

Eld. D. N. Wetzel, of Richland Center, was elected my successor as secretary, and J. C. Thurman, of Green Bay, was elected president, J. H. Berkey, of Monroe, exchanging places with him, thus becoming vice-president. Otherwise the board remains the same.

Addresses delivered before the convention were of a high order, and Monroe hospitality, which has become proverbial, made us all feel welcome and

The State Board planned to begin the year's work with four protracted meetings, as follows: Fennimore, Clinton, Platteville and one by Elder H. F. Barstow at Rib Lake. The evangelist for the year has not yet been employed.

The next convention will be held at Waupun, Sept. 20-24, 1901.

As for myself, I will settle in pastoral work after Nov. 1. I desire to thank the Wisconsin brethren for their generous hospitality, co-operation and good will during the two years I served them as state missionary. I shall be always interested in the success of their work. They have my prayers. For Bro. Wetzel and my successor I pray abundant blessing and that the brethren throughout the state may support them most heartily.

Dedication at Hennessey, Okla.

Hennessey is an exceedingly live town on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. R. It is in Oklahoma Territory and is surrounded by as rich and beautiful land as one could wish to see.

Wheat is the staple production, although quite a good deal of corn and cotton is grown in this country. We have never before seen so many great wheat ricks or so many or so large wheat fields as we have since coming to Oklahoma. Our people were very wise in starting in with the town, and they have been very wise in building a beautiful and commodious house of worship.

The town is quite well supplied with church buildings. It has a M. E., a Baptist, a M. E. South, a Congregationalist, a Catholic and two colored churches, besides the Christian. The house just completed by our people is by far the largest and best church house in the place.

It is built in modern style; has two corner entrances, with vestibule; has a main auditorium and lecture room that are thrown together, also two robing rooms.

The baptistry, pulpit and platform, platform for organ and choir, etc., are all conveniently located. The windows are beautiful and the car-

Lord's day, Sept. 30, was an ideal day for dedication. The weather was all that could be asked for, the congregation large, the giving generous, and all the services most joyful. There was an indebtedness of $1,300 to provide for and we raised something more than $1,500 in cash and pledges. The pledges are in the form of bankable notes, and as they are from good, responsible parties the debt is surely provided for. Bro. J. Tom Purvis is the pastor of the church at Hennessev. He has worked hard and faithfully and to him is the church largely indebted for the success of their building enterprise.

Bro. Purvis is a good man and a hard-working preacher and pastor. The church at Hennessey should increase his salary and continue his ser-

It is remarkable how rapidly this town and the country around it is improving.

Joe Sweeney's Departure-Its Lessons.

The death of Joe Irwin Sweeney calls for more, I think, than a passing notice, and yet space will not allow all that I would like to say of the young manhood of our friend.

The measureless grief that fills the heart of Bro. and Sister Sweeney, and indeed the home where he has lived for twenty years, must be forever untold. Our young friend and brother embodied in his life many manly qualities. He was tender, considerate, generous and true in every fibre of his being. Besides having a handsome and magnificent physical form, he had large impulse and a subtle magnetism that gave spring and charm to life.

Not long before his death he revealed to his father that he had fully decided to enter the ministry, he said he could do more good in that sphere than in any other walk of life. It will ever remain a blessed thought to his father, now that Joe is gone, that Jesus Christ was to have the best of his powers.

President Butler, at the funeral service held at the home, spoke in the highest possible terms of the college life of Joe. His ability was recognized all through the college, and his absolute unselfishness and good cheer captivated all the students. His death has made many think, and I believe made them better and tenderer. His departure is a great calamity to the home and the church of which he has been a member since he was twelve years of age.

The personal Christ made Joe Sweeney what he was. His faith in the Christ began in childhood and continued to the end. It is Christ in the man that makes the man. Christ in a man is the only hope of a pure, manly life and the only hope of Christ dominating the life is the secret of glory. strength and happiness and power.

But this brief tribute must close. Farewell, Joe. We shall always remember thee kindly and lovingly. We will never forget thy smile, thy affection and noble-heartedness. May the birds ever carol over thy grave, and may the angels of love and peace guard those that loved thee so well. And when God shall come to make up his jewels may thy spirit shine among the brightest. And may the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory through Jesus Christ, after we have suffered awhile, make us perfect, establish, strengthen, settle us. JAMES SMALL. Remarkable Success of a New Treatment for Piles.

For many years it has been supposed that the only absolutely sure cure for piles was by surgical opertion, but the danger to life and the pain and expense has been so great that many thousands suffer for years rather than to submit to this last resort; or they seek the temporary relief in the many remedies claimed to relieve piles and rectal troubles, salves, ointments and similar simple remedies which give only slight and very temporary relief.

A new preparation which is painless and harmless but which affords immediate relief and in many cases a complete cure in a very short time, is sold by druggists under the name of Pyramid Pile Cure.

It is in suppository form used at night and its regular use has cured thousands of obstinate, long standing cases, and it seems to be equally effective in all the various forms of piles, whether itching, bleeding or protruding.

The Pyramid Pile cure allays the inflammation and intolerable itching, reduces the tumors, and its astringent properties cause the enlarged blood vessels to contract to a normal healthy condition.

A Baltimore gentleman relates his experience with the Pyramid Pile cure in these words:

"It affords me unusual pleasure to add my endorsement to those of others relative to your really wonderful pile remedy. I was a sufferer for years until told by a fellow salesman of the Pyramid Pile Cure. It has entirely cured me and I cheerfully send Cure. It has entirely cured me and I cheerfully send this for publication if you wish to use it in that direction. I wish you would send me one of your little books on cause and cure of piles, I desire to show it to some friends."

Any pile sufferer may use the Pyramid with certainty that it will give instant relief and regular use a permanent cure and the still further certainly that it contains no cocaine, morphine or metallic or mineral poison.

The Co-operative Work.

Now that the offering for state and district work is at hand, a few words from one who has been actively engaged in the work for two years may not be out of place. It is useless to urge the necessity of co-operation. It is the only salvation for hundreds of churches and thousands of souls.

Having given this subject considerable study, I desire to make a few suggestions. First, the ministry must be converted to this branch of our mission work. I find that they as a class take less interest in this than in any other line of church work. Seventy-five per cent. of the money raised for the support of this work in Northwestern Indiana during the last two years has been raised through the personal effort of the evangelist.

Second, we must enlarge our vision. I am astonished beyond measure when I think of the limited influence of some of our best churches, and the things by which it is limited. I desire to quote one statement from one of my former elders: "I can count 900 prefessed followers of the Master in and around this town, including five ministers. This great army, with all our boasted wealth, has been instrumental in converting twenty-one persons in the last year."

Third, we need to think more of saving others, even if we have to lose sight of self. We are more anxious to save our reputation than we are to preach the gospel to the poor.

A New Assembly to be Established.

At the recent convention of the Disciples of Christ at Baltimore a movement for the establishment of a new summer resort and assembly grounds was approved and accepted. The location, nature and prospectus of this new resort are set forth in the following paragraphs from the Georgetown Republican and Baltimore Sun more definitely than we can state them.

A tract of land containing nearly 1000 acres between Indian River and Fenwick Island, fronting on the ocean, has been purchased by Scranton, Pa., capitalists, who will convert the same into a magnificent summer resort.

In order trat the beach can be easily reachel, the line of either steam or electric power will be constructed from Dageboro. The route has been surveyed and right of way secured.

There is no finer beach on the coast. natural advantages are unsurpassed. The pleasure seekers will revel in nature's products, meloos, peaches, grapes, pears, apples, persimmons and walnus are raised in large quantities. Sweet and white potatoes, peanuts, cabbage, corn and all varieties of vegetables can be grown. Boating and sailing are unexcelled. The gradual large of the heath makes bathing a delightful alope of the beach makes bathing a delightful pleasure. Fish, such as drums, fatbacks, ocean trout, tints and crocus are caught in abundance. -Republican.

An agreement has been entered into with the company under which the latter agrees to build an auditorium and lay out 13 acres of and with flowers bids, trees and walks, and to deed, free of all cost, this land and improvements to the Disciples of Carist. The remainder of the land the company propieses platting into sites for cot tages, with boulevards and avenues. Lots 40-130 feet will range in price from $50 upward according to location. It is also the purpose of the company to construt a railroad, eith r steam or electric, from Dagaboro, Del., to the beach and to run a steamer on Indian bay between Rehoboth and the assembly ground.

There is to be a park on the grounds, with swings, merry-go-rounds, tennis courts and a base-ball field. The beach selected is near Ocean ball field. The beach selection is a large number Vew, Del., and on the property is a large number

Such a resort for our people in the East ought to prove helpful, not only as a retreat for the summer, and for mutual edification, but also as a propaganda of the faith once delivered to the Baints among a class of people that could not otherwise be reached. The acquisition of such a place, so elegantly furnished and equipped free of cost, is certainly a gift not to be despised, and with it a rare opportunity for the extension of the Master's work on the Atlantic Coast, and we certainly wish the brethren success in this new enterprise.

Another item in connection with the movement will be of interest to our readers. The directors of this company are desirous of giving the beach an appropriate name. To this end they will give a choice lot, valued at $150, to the person who will suggest the same. This offer remains open until Nov. 1st, when a committee of five disinterested parties will name the successful competitor.

In The Interest of Reforms.

Two years ago the Illinois Christian Citizenship League made an earnest fight in behalf of five reform bills in the State Legislature. We propose to renew the effort this year. We are writing all the candidates for the State Legislature on all the party tickets, asking whether or not they will support our five bills. The bills are as follows:

- 1. To stop the sale of cigarettes to boys.
- 2. To print at the bottom of the ticket in municipal elections, for license and against license. The resulting vote to be mandatory on the city
- 3. To prohibit the entrance of a minor into a saloon
- 4. To forbid the establishment of cold storage houses for malt and intoxicating liquors within two miles of a no-license town.
- 5. To turn the license fee into the county treasury instead of town treasury.

These will all be submitted to the candidates before election and from the replies we will be able to know who will help us among the members elected.

As soon as our bills are referred to the various committees in the regular order of proceeding, it will be necessary for us to petition each member from as many of his constituents as possible to vote favorably for our bills in committee. Then if the bill is carried in the committee, it will be necessary to do the same thing with every member of the House and Senate, asking for his vote to carry the bills. We do not petition with general petitions because it becomes everybody's business and nobody's business and is ineffectual, but each man is petitioned only by his own constituents. This method is effective. To do this requires an extensive and expensive correspondence, virtually covering all the towns and communities in the state before we succeed with it. I have personally seen members of the Legislature changed from opposition to our bills to hearty support of them by these petitions and therefore know it is an effectual way. We earnestly solicit the hearty co-operation of all the church people of the state of Illinois in this practical work. Are we really willing to make any effort to bring about conditions by our law-making whereby it is easier for a man to do right than to do wrong? This is the gist of our whole effort and we labor in vain unless the church forces of the state back us in the undertaking. JAMES H. SHAW, Secretary Illinois Christian Citizenship League.

Bloomington, Ill.

[The influence of such a committee properly and strongly wielded would be of incalculable good in the way of enforcing present laws, securing better ones and improving present conditions. Such a committee ought to exist in every municipality .--THE EDITOR.]

That Church Beneficiary System.

From the nature of 2ro. Pack's reference to my article on "A Church Beneficiary System" and the Editor's remarks I am not sure that I made myself understood. It did not occur to my mind that the church should run an insurance society, but so organize its fraternal and benevolent elements as to provide for its members that material protection and aid that life in this world under existing conditions makes necessary.

The fraternal and benevolent spirit exists in the church, but it has no adequate agency through which to work and it is the duty of the church to supply this agency in its own body and not make it necessary for its members to be "yoked up with unbelievers" in extra-church organizations in order to obtain ordinary brotherly care.

The teaching spirit is in the church and that this spirit might work practically the Sundayschool was organized. It is the business of the church to practically adapt the whole Christ-life in it to the conditions which exist on earth to-day. Surely the church is not to be more completely restricted to the spiritual than its Master, whose first work was always to look after the bodies of men.

One of the first things which the apostolic church did was to establish a commune and organize its charities.

Too long has the notion prevailed that men's material conditions are within a circle touched only at its circumference by the religion of Jesus Christ. The church has speculated about a thousand things beyond the possibility of human comprehension and neglected the duties which lay at its doors. To this day it is guilty of a sinful waste of time and energy in speculating about the higher criticism and revision of creeds, while practical affairs which cry aboud for attention go unheeded. But a great change is coming. A new reformation that will astonish and move the world is not far distant. F. M. CUMMINGS.

Marlboro, O., Oct. 13.

The young American lady of to day has many advantages not accorded their grandmothers nor even their mothers, in the matter of education. Especially is this true in the musical department of the many fine schools devoted entirely to the advancement of women.

There seems to be a general disposition on the part of the leading seminaries to elevate the standard of music and as a ground-work upon which to build up this department of art the best of them are equiping their schools with the highest grade of Pianos, as noticed from the fact that recently the Christian College, of Columbia, Mo., has just purchased ten Jesse French Pianos; Ward Seminary, of Nashville, Tenn., ten Starr Pianos; Judson Female Institute Marion, Ala., twenty, and Columbus Female College, Columbus, Miss., twelve, all from the same manufacturers. This speaks well for the college as also for the pianos-for when making such extensive purchases the mar-ket is usually thoroughly investigated.

Every young lady should take a course in music and before entering will do well to investigate the equipment which is furnished her.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

South McAlester, Oct. 9.—Just closed our third meeting here in the 17 months of my pastorate. We have had considerably over 100 added to the Church. Now have one of the very best Churches in the Territory. Elected delegates to the National Convention yesterday; will leave for Kansas City Wednesday evening, going back to dear old Mis-souri to meet with old friends and brethren of that grand old commonwealth .-- J. C. HOWELL.

ALABAMA.

Athens, Oct. 9 .- Since last report we have visited numerous points in central and northern Alabama. We spent last Lord's day in Athens, and urged upon the prethren the importance of building a house of worship. At a special meeting of the congregation on last evening it was decided to build. Nearly a thousand dollars were subscribed. twelve or fifteen hundred dollar house will be built and practically for cash.—S. R. HAWKINS, state evangelist.

NEBRASKA.

Brad haw, Oct. 9.—Our meeting which began about two weeks ago is doing nicely. Ten accessions to date; all good, representative people. Bro. J. S. Beem is doing the preaching. Pray for us.

—C. C. WHITAKER.

Deweese, Oct. 11.—I closed my first year with the Deweese church Oct. 1. It has been a very pleasant and profitable year. We started last Lord's day for another year or indefinitely. Had two confessions; the church is in the best condition. We look for better things in the future. We expect to begin a meeting at home about November 1. Pray for us.—E. W. Yocum.

No. 7 Tenth St., El Vedado, Havana, Oct. 2.— Two were baptized yesterday. Our services now are as follows: Lord's day school in our house at 9:30 A. M. every Lord's day, followed by worship including communion at 10:30 A. M.; then at 7:30 P. M. services in 63 Prado and prayer-meeting at P. M. services in 63 Frago and prayer-meeting at 7:30 r. TEXAS.

Austin, Oct. 6.—Evangelist S. M. Martin closed last Sunday night his six weeks' protracted meeting with the Central Christian Church. There were 31 additions to the church, 15 by confession were 31 additions to the church, 15 by confession and baptism. This was good when we consider the fact that the field is well gleaned from month to month. We push the work here and do not leave as much for an evangelist as is found in some other fields. Bro. Martin's audiences were large and our people were much pleased with him. I have heard Moses E. Lard, Benjamin Franklin and other great evangelists through protracted meetings and I have never heard a man who could meetings and I have never heard a man who could preach the gospel with more power than Bro. Martin. We hope to hear him again.—J. W. LOWBER.

KANSAS.

Columbia, Oct. 6 .- One baptism here since last report. Also four baptisms and on from the Methodists that had been immersed at Weir City as the result of a few sermons there recently. Am now in a meeting at Baxter Springs; six sermons and five additions so far. Will hold a meeting here with my home church in November.—M. McFarland, pastor.

"Unawares."

The beautiful lesson of the Master, recorded in Matt. 25:31-46, that what we do to each other in this life He will account as if done to Himself in person is so graphically illustrated in the following lines that I have decided to request a place for them in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The hollowness and unreasonableness of our excuses for not aiding the blamelessly helpless are, in the light of these lines, glaringly apparent. But here are the lines. I do not know the author.

J. M. TENNISON.

They said: "The Master is coming
To honor the town to-day,
And none can tell at what house or home
The Master will choose to stay."
Then I thought, while my heart beat wildly,
What if He should come to mine?
How I would strive to entertain
And honor the Guest divine!

And straight I turned to toiling,
To make my home more neat;
I swept and polished and garnished,
And decked it with blossoms sweet.
I was troubled for fear the Master
Might come ere my task was done,
And I hastened, and worked the faster,
And watched the hurrying sun.

But right in the midst of my duties,
A woman came to my door;
She had come to tell me her sorrows,
And my comfort and aid to implore.
And I said: "I cannot listen,
Nor help you any to day;
I have greater things to attend to,"
And the pleader turned away.

But soon there came another,
A cripple thin, pale, and gray;
And said: "O, let me stop and rest
Awhile in your home, I pray!
I have traveled far since morning,
I am hungry and faint and weak;
My heart is full of misery,
And comfort and help I seek."

And I said: "I am grieved and sorry,
But I cannot keep you to-day;
I look for a great and noble Guest,"
And the cripple went away.
And the day wore onward swiftly,
And my task was nearly done;
And a prayer was ever in my heart,
That the Master to me might come.

And I thought I would spring to meet him,
And treat him with utmost care;
When a little child stood by me,
With a face so sweet and fair.
Sweet, but with marks of teardrops,
And his clothes were tattered and old;
A finger was bruised and bleeding,
And his little bare feet were cold.

And I said: "I am sorry for you;
You are sorely in need of care,
But I cannot stop to give it,
You must hasten other where."
And at the words a shadow
Swept over his blue-veined brow.
"Some one will feed and clothe you, dear;
But I am too busy now."

At last the day was ended,
And my toil was over and done;
My house was swept and garnished,
And I watched in the dusk alone.
Watched, but no footfall sounded;
No one paused at my gate;
No one entered my cottage door;
I could only pray and wait.

I waited till night had deepened,
And the Master had not come;
"He has entered some other door," I cried,
"And gladdened some other home!"

My labor had been for nothing, And I bowed my head and wept; My heart was sore with longing, Yet, spite of it all, I slept.

Then the Master stood before me,
And his face was grieved and fair;
"Three times to-day I came to your door,
And craved your pity and care;
Three times you sent me onward,
Unhelped and uncomforted;
And the blessing you might have had was lost,
And your chance to serve has fled."

"O Lord, dear Lord, forgive me!
How could I know it was Thee?"
My very soul was shamed, and bowed
In the depths of humility.
And he said: "The sin is pardoned,
But the blessing is lost to thee;
For, failing to comfort the least of mine,
Ye have failed to comfort me."

The Greater Victory.

C. H. WETHERBE.

He who accomplishes a valuable work amid much malign opposition achieves a far greater victory than does he who, doing the same work, had no opposition. Men are often praised for the excellent work which they have done in a certain sphere, and probably they deserve commendation; but it is well to inquire into the conditions under which they have performed their work. If the conditions have been favorable to the utmost freedom of person and exercise, and the labor has not been difficult in itself, then there is nothing especially praiseworthy in the performance. But it is far different with those who have wrought under adverse conditions of an obstinate and warlike character. Those who carry to completion an important work under such conditions are deserving of far greater commendation than those whose work is done under happy conditions, although the work itself may be very valuable. I think that Nehemiah and his faithful helpers scored a greater victory in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, amid mighty and persistent opposition, than Solomon and his men did when they erected the temple, magnificent as it was. Solomon had easy and happy conditions, while Nehemiah's conditions of service were extremely unfavorable. And then think of the extremely adverse conditions under which Christ and his few disciples pursued their work of evangelizing the world. I do not believe that the Christians of this land to-day have any adequate conception of the tremendous opposition which Christ and his small band had to meet on every hand. Almost everything, humanly speaking, was against them. One of the most gigantic and despotic political powers that the world ever saw was furiously set against them. A paganized Judaism had a deep hold on the masses. Superstition and bigotry were everywhere rampant. How unequal the contest seemed to be! How small the force on Christ's side appeared to be, as compared with the opposition forces! And yet Christ and his little band of followers went right on in their spiritual work, sending out the dynamic truth of God everywhere they went, nothing daunted by the magnitude of the opposition. Does not Christ's victory over the devil and the world seem all the greater as we look at the severely adverse conditions under which he waged his warfare? Verily it does; and it ought to stimulate us when we incline to repine at the opposition which we sometimes meet in our work. Why should we faint?

"In Good Standing."

The meaningless nature of the term, "In good standing," is aptly described by Church Life in the following words:

The ice cold Christian may be a member of the church "in good and regular standing." Yes, and a contributing member, too. He attends church quite regularly and sings in the choir. When he gets his "Sunday best" on he looks quite like a Christian, but how does he live?

No daily Bible reading.

No blessing asked at the table.

No family prayer.

No Bible instruction for the children.

No religious conversation in the home.

No private prayer.

No attendance at the week-day services. No attendance at the Sunday-school.

No Christ in his choice of reading matter.

No Christ in his favorite amusement.

And only a little of Christ in his head.

Well, what has he, then, which the commonest sinner has not?

1. He has his name on the church roll.

2. He has his name on the list of contributing members.

3. He has a pew or an occasional sitting in church.

These three things and nothing more to entitle him to the glorious name of Christian

If he should suddenly die, he would be given a Christian burial, and these three things about him would be sure to be mentioned in the funeral sermon, and held out to the bereaved family as reasons for a blessed assurance that he has gone straight to glory, with an abundant entrance.

How many of our readers are described in the foregoing list of failures? We hope not many, and these should repent at once.

For Indigestion Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. GREGORY DOYLE, Syracuse, N. Y. says: "I have frequently prescribed it in cases of indigestion and nervous prostration, and find the result so satisfactory that I shall continue it."

The Two-year Old.

How deeply winning are the ways Of children in their infant days! The eye that scans the speaker through; Th' inquiry if "the tale be true?" The dumb show, where the word oft fails, Yet quite as much as speech avails; The pressure of the soft, fond cheek, That doth such confidence bespeak; How truly we may here behold The infant mind of "two year-old!"

In some, whilst still upon the knee, The spirit struggles to be free; Mark, too, the temper's ruffled skein, As yet held but by snaffle rein; The energy that speaks command, The action done as soon as planned; The "tug-of war" in every way That may ensure the mastery; And this perhaps we may be told, Is unregenerate "two year-old."

O mothers! watch with trembling joy The dawning of your infant boy; The mind that's formed without a plan, Will never make the "perfect man; Think not that coming years will swell The stock which is not grafted well; The sapling which receives no care Is little better than a tare; Then soon as buds of ill unfold. Suppress them in your "two year old."

--- ANON.

A Broken Thread.

It was one of the boy's duties to carry the mail from the summer hotel where he worked to the postoffice in the neighboring village. He was an honest boy, but apt to be careless at times.

One day, on his return from the office, he found that a letter had remained in the bag unnoticed when he took out the others. He took it out now and looked at it. It was directed to some town in France.

He could still mail it in time for the noon train if he ran all the way back; but it was a scorching day, the road was dusty, and he was tired. Besides there was a game of ball going on that he wanted to see. It did not look like an important letter. A thin, light thing, directed in a woman's hand! Pshaw! Women were always scribbling!

He threw it into the bag and went whistling to the bali-field.

The letter was mailed two hours later. It reached New York just an hour too late for the steamer, and was thus delayed four days.

Old Jeanne, the cook at the hotel, went about that summer crooning happily to herself, muttering and laughing when she was alone, paring the potatoes. When her mistress asked her one day why she laughed, she said:

"It's for Louis, madame-my old Louis. He comes at last. It was for that I save and save, one-two year. He is lame and sick-not like me. I come here with my boy, Jean, so that we can all make a home here. Jean is dead. Then I work here alone to bring my husband. We take ze little cabin yonder. I cook for you; Louis, he makes us a little garden. He shall have care of the poulets. We shall talk over the old times. We shall be as happy as the birds."

She went on to tell her plan. The old man was to walk from the hills to Havre. where he was to take the ship. She had sent the money for his passage in a draft. He had it now. He would be here next week. They would never be separated again.

The old man went to Havre on the day set, but he found no letter. Worn out with his journey, ill and penniless, he wandere i about the quays of the great seaport for three days, and at last was taken to a house of refuge for paupers.

The letter came at last, but it was too late. It never reached him. He died the following winter.

Jeanne worked alone for the rest of her life, in merciful ignorance that her life was so lonely and empty just because a wellmeaning boy had failed in a trifling duty.

Human lives are so closely together that the cutting of a single thread sometimes starts a rent which may extend beyond our knowledge or power to help .--Youth's Companion.

Practical Sermons from Revised Texts.

BY REV. PRACTICAL CHRISTIAN.

Subject: ONE-TENTH.

TEXT: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor one-tenth as well as thyself." Lk, 10:27.

This would be a fine place to live if we all obeyed Jesus' words and loved our neighbor. Shake hands with him every Sunday at church and wish him well through the week, but when we make a trade with him get the best end of the bargain, of course. Don't love him too much or you might spoil him. Remember that charity begins at home (and too often stays there), and he who does not provide for his own household is worse than an infidel.

Don't be such a fool as to think you must take an interest in foreigners or people outside of your own circle. And you must not think as much of anybody as yourself-just one-tenth-the tithing plan. Give one-tenth of your profits to church and charity. As the Master said to the disciples of old, "Go sell one-tenth that thou hast and give to the poor and come follow me."

Love your neighbor at least one tenth as well as yourself, for love is the fulfilling of

Let us bow our heads while we love.

How to Decrease Church Attendance.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:-I saw two weeks since in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGEL-IST a clipping from some paper, showing how to reduce attendance at church by wearing the people "clean out" by unnecessary prolongation of services. I suggest that you put in that excellent clipping again, and put in the following which belongs to the same list:

When you offer thanks for the "cup" and "loaf," make a long prayer instead of expressing briefly the thanks of the church.

When you dismiss the congregation at the close of the prolonged discourse and make some final remarks of further exhortation, offer another long prayer.

By following these directions, along with those published in the CHRISTIAN EVANGEL-IST of a couple or three weeks ago, "empty benches" will gradually increase in number. AMRAM THUMPER.

Letters of Introduction.

[The following, clipped from one of our city dailies, aside from its humorous character, forcibly emphasizes the abuse and danger in the too familiar custom of writing letters of introduction—especially for strangers.

—EDITOR.]

"I disapprove of letters of introduction," said an elderly New Orleans business man to a Times reporter, "and I won't give one under any circumstances. They are bad form and border close on downright impertinence. What right have I, for example, to thrust a perfect stranger on my friend, John Smith, of Memphis or Chattanooga, without having at least asked Mr. Smitn's permission or ascertained whether the introduction would be mu ually agreeable? Then, again, such letters always mean either too little or too much. Most of us give them almost as freely as we give good advice, without the least idea of incurring any responsibility; yet a letter of introduction is, or ought to be, an absolute indorsement of the bearer, and the recipient would be justified in holding the writer strictly responsible for any abuse of his hospitality. I believe this view is unassailable, but I must confess I stopped writing letters of introduction myself on account of a little contretemps that has nothing to do with the proprieties of the question. It happened this way:

"A certain friend asked me to give a letter to a young Englishman, introducing him to a former business partner of mine, now living in Louisville. I didn't want to do it, but lacked moral courage to refuse; so I wrote two letters-one the introduction requested and the other a brief note to the Louisville man explaining the circumstances and saying that I didn't really know whether the Englishman was a gentleman or a horsethief. Two days later I got a telegram from my old partner saying that he had reseived a letter of introduction by mail and was at a loss what to make of it. I had put the two inclosures in the wrong envelopes and had given the Englishman the private note of repudiation."

"I suppose he read it, of course," remarked some one in the group of listeners.

"That's just what has been troubling me ever since," replied the old merchant. "I don't know whether he did or not. He presented it without turning a hair and if he knew the contents he certainly made no sign. At least that is the report of my friend, who was so surprised when he ran his eye over the epistle that he nearly fell out of his chair. All this happened four years ago and I haven't written a letter of introduction since. I wouldn't meet the Englishman again for a $1,000 bill, because if I did I wouldn't know whether to shake hands or get ready to fight."

John Bright.

The great English statesman, John Bright, a man who has done perhaps as much for the morals of England as any other great Englishman, said on one occasion, "I believe that there is no field of labor, no field of Christian benevolence, which has yielded a greater harvest in our national interests and character than the great institution of Sunday-schools." This is the testimony of a great man who believed it was better to train up boys and girls to be good citizens than it was to neglect them when children and to try to take care of them as men and women. Nothing in the United States is doing so much to advance the interests of Sunday-schools as the International Sunday-school Convention and the State and County Conventions which are auxiliary The next International Convention will be held in Denver, 1902. Our State (or Provincial) organization is working in the same line and is doing much to advance the interest of Sunday-schools of all denominations in our part of the country. Circulars explaining the International Sunday-school work may be had of Marion Lawrence, General Secretary, Toledo, Ohio.

Presidents of Missouri University.

Since its establishment the University of Missouri has had seven presidents and three acting presidents. The names and terms of office of each are as follows:

The first president of the university was Prof. John H. Lathrop, who served nine years. In 1849 he resigned the presidency of this institution and accepted a like position in the University of Wisconsin.

James Shannon, the second president, was inaugurated in 1850. and served six years. Dr. Shannon died in 1859.

W. W. Hudson was elected in 1856, and died in office in 1859.

Prof. G. H. Matthews, chairman of the Faculty, discharged the duties of the office until 1860, dying in 1869.

B. B. Minor was the fourth president, and during his administration the civil war interrupted the work of the school. It was reorganized in 1862.

John H. Lathrop, the first president of the school, was chairman of the Faculty from 1862 to 1865, when he was again made president. He died in 1866.

Daniel Read succeeded President Lathrop and held that office until 1876. He died in Iowa in 1878.

Dr. S. S. Laws, of New York, was inaugurated in 1876 and resigned in 1889. Dr. Laws now lives in Washington, D. C.

Dr. M. M. Fisher, as chairman of the Faculty, then acted as president until his death, February 20, 1890.

Dr. J. S. Blackwell was appointed to succeed him, and discharged the duties of that office until June 3, 1891.

R. H. Jesse, who had been elected in December of the preceding year, was installed on January 3, 1891, as the seventh president of the institution.

III.—Linda May Discovers a Dog. Continued.

It was curious how strange everything looked to Linda May as she slipped along toward the front sidewalk. There was a big, black something in the side yard that in the daytime was only a trame-work covered with honeysu kle vines; but now it looked like a something on its knees with its arms reaching out to grab her. And when she looked back it did not look like Aunt Dollie's house, but like a wicked blackwindowed house that had crawled up into the yard and had swa lowed Aunt Dollie's residence and was squatting there in its place. Even the well-kept bluegrass was dark and clicking with uncouth bugs and insects. There was a bat circling overhead, and oh, how afraid she was of bats; because they are blind, and how do you know but what they will fly against you with their web feet? But she crept on, carrying the empty cigar box and thinking how she would tell Madge and Pete and Letitia and Jennie about this thrilling adventure in the front yard at ten o'clock at night. Then all of a sudden and without any warning Linda May heard a noise-a curious noise—a noise near at hand. She wanted to run back to the house, but her legs stiffened with terror and refused to carry her one step. Her eyes had grown used to the darkness and she began to see things better. And she saw a black object in the corner of the yard, and the black object moved and then she knew that the noise she had heard came from this black object. The black object lay close to the ground as if trying to hide, but Linda May could see nothing else. She thought of calling Aunt Dollie, but her throat was as dry as a cornfield when it hasn't rained all summer. The black object began to crawl toward her with the strangest sound you ever heard, with a clink, clink, clink, clink. Linda May knew she couldn't run, but she thought maybe she could walk away. So she strained at her right foot, but it had become so heavy, it seemed fastened to the The black object came closer. ground. Clink, clink, clink! Linda May was so terrified that she dropped her box. That made the black object stop. She wished she had thrown the box at it. Maybe it would have stopped to eat up the box before coming to get her. But pretty soon it began to come closer. And then it began to make another kind of sound-sniffling, pathetic, shrill little cries. So she knew it was a dog. And the reason it went clink, clink, was because there was a tin can tied to its tail, and that is the way tin cans go under such circumstances.

Linda May was no longer afraid. The dog was a stranger to her, but she knew that no dog under such humiliating conditions would offer to do any harm. Indeed he was plainly asking her to remove the despised can. It suddenly occurred to her that here was her golden dream realized. Here was a dog at last that had come to be her dog, to belong to her, head and tail. She sank upon her knees and patted it. He was a shepherd dog, large and silky. A piece of moonlight seemed to quiver (n his nose; that was a white spot. She examined the place where the string was tied about his tail. It was a hard knot. She worked at it, while the dog lay with his nose between his forepaws, as if turned to stone. He was an abject and disgraced dog, and he had not enough selfrespect left to turn his neck and look at her when she gave his tail an extra hard tug. A dog that will not even wink when you pull his tail, but will stare moodily before him, has reached the lowest depths of shame. Y u can always get the better of a hard knot if you bring your teeth to bear upon it, but under the circumstances Linda May could only use her fingers. But at last she pulled in the right place. The string came off. The dog was free. As soon as he knew this he jumped up, wagged his tail as if to shake off the very memory of its late degradation, and leaped about the girl. Linda May patted him in an absent-minded way. She was plotting a plot. She started toward the house and the dog followed. That showed that he wanted to stay. He was not somebody else's dog. But how could Linda May hide him from Aunt Dollie? Poor Linda May! Already she was thinking of keeping this secret from aunt who loved her and did so much for her. She thought maybe Madge would take him; then whenever she visited Madge she could play with the dog. But what could she do with him until the next day?

In the back yard was a storm-cellar with a little hill over it, only Aunt Dollie wouldn't let you roll on it for fear of hurting your dress. It was never used except when a storm was coming or looked like it was coming (they generally turned out not to be storms, but Aunt Dollie took no chances on clouds and she ran to hide from all of them). Down in this storm-cellar was Linda May's play-house, if you can call it a play-house where you have to keep everything straightened up as if you were looking for company. There were no windows, but the door had a pane of glass in the top part. Besides, she kept the door opened when she played down there-what fun when the girls came to see her! Linda May decided to put the dog down in this cellar-at least if he were willing. She went around the house with him close behind her, and now she wasn't afraid of anything. She opened the door and went down the steps. He followed. Sh doubled up a rug and patted it and he lay down; she could tell that by keeping her hand on his back-it was too dark to see. He seemed to understand just what she wanted, for when she left he did not try to follow. So she shut the door (of course there were openings where air could get in), and then she went into the house and reached her room and Aunt Dollie didn't know anything about it! Linda May was so delighted over her adventure and so sorry about keeping it from Aunt Dollie that she could hardly sleep. The next morning while her aunt was getting breakfast Linda May ran out in the front yard to get her box. And now what do you think? Do you believe she found any candy in it or that it was just an empty and disappointing box? I will tell you what she found in that box; ten cents worth of lemon drops; and you know you can get a good many lemon drops for that much money. Now what do you think about that tramp that left candy around in little girls' boxes? She concluded he must be a pretty good kind of a tramp; not a church member, perhaps, but a moral man. Only she couldn't understand why he would leave a letter in Madge's box that would make Madge's mother cry. If ever a tram; was a mystery she thought Nap was that tramp. Linda May put the candy in her school satchel, and she was anxious to go out and visit her dog, but just then the breakfast bell rang.

"Aunt Dollie," said Linda May, in a deeply subtle manner, "suppose somebody should give me a dog?"

"I wouldn't let 'em," said the other.

"But if Bro. Temples did?" That was the preacher.

"I'd tell him to keep his dog," said Miss Dollie, dryly. To Miss Dollie a preaches was just a man.

"Well—well—suppose a stray dog came here Aunt Dollie, a lame dog, and he wanted to stay; such a pretty dog, a big, black shepherd, with long, silky hair all over him and I would just want to keep him!"

"If he wouldn't go away, Linda May, I's send for the marshal."

"But, oh, Aunt Dollie! The marshal shoot stray dogs. He has to; it's his business."

Yes, I know it is," said Aunt Dollie, as is she thought it a pretty good business. That settled it with Linda May. If she could just get the dog to Madge's! But be fore that happened, she must keep he secret. Hiding the dog on anybody's premise is a difficult thing; on Miss Dollie's premise it would be almost impossible.

THE PRODIGAL SON*

This is the gem among the parables, the choicest eting of the jewel of divine love. It is "a divine tome of the wandering of man and the love of d such as no literature has ever equalled, such no ear of man has ever heard elsewhere. Put the ore scale all that Confucius, or Sakya Juni, or Zoroaster, or Socrates, ever wrote or il-and they wrote and said many beautiful and ly words-and put in the other the Parable of Prodigal Son alone, with all that this single able connects and means, and can any candid rit doubt which scale would outweigh the other ternal preciousness—in divine adaptation to wants of man?" May He who uttered it aid to get therefrom its best meaning and noblest

Many fanciful interpretations e been put upon this parable, but its primary pose and meaning are unmistakable. It, too, meant to rebuke the Pharisees for their critins of Jesus, as a friend of publicans and sins. But its lesson went farther than those of preceding parables. They taught God's love the lost soul, but it also taught the soul's hunfor God's pardon and favor. he puts himself beyond the reach of letters from home. He deliberately attempts to cut himself off from all good influences, that he may give lust free rein. Many a young man, coming to the city from his rural or village home, repeats this experience of the prodigal, and lives a life that he would be ashamed to have reported to the loving and trusting ones whom he has left behind him. Alas! that such an one cannot see that he is degrading his manhood, destroying his opportunities, and dooming his future to bitter remorse and despair.

The story of his career is soon told. He "wasted his substance in riotous living." A half dozen words is enough to describe his rapid descent. Riches have wings, and when the cage of selfrestraint is opened they take their swift flight unbidden. For a little time this young man was the center of an admiring crowd, who dogged his steps, praised his wine, laughed at his wit, and helped to squauder his money. But the friendship of the world is false,-it clings to one but to take from him what of selfish gratification he can afford. When he can no longer entertain or minister, he is cast off. So, "when he had spent all," he found bimself friendless. To add to his distress, a great famine came upon the land. His wants became so imperative that he sought for some way, however base it might be, by which to earn bread. He found employment at last, of a kind that to a Jew would be perhaps the most dishonorable of all, that of feeding swine. Little did he think, the day he proudly left his father's house, with his fortune in his wallet, that so soon he would be glad to get this disgraceful "job." Could we but see the result of our sins from the beginning, we would not trifle with them as we do. Yet we ought to be warned, for both divine revelation and human experience assure us that the way of the transgressor is hard, and that the wages of sin is death. Hunger adds its pangs to his humiliation, and he is denied even a sufficiency of the carob pods upon which the swine are fed. Depraved, desolate and famishing, he is surely at the extremity of his wretched career. Alas! that so many prodigals are content to stay among the swine, and cultivate an appetite for the husks of animal pleasures till the memory of better things dies out of their hearts.

But this prodigal was not utterly dead to his former life of peace and purity. Intoxicated for a time by the whirl of sinful indulgence, he at last "comes to himself," and realizes his folly and wickedness. He can but contrast his present disgrace and misery with the honor and plenty that had been his, in the days when he had loved and obeyed his indulgent father. Even the servants in his home have plenty, while he, a son, is starving. "I will arise and go to my father!" is the sudden resolution he forms, and he puts it into immediate execution. Well for him that he did not tarry, and balance reasons pro and con, or his resolution might have failed, and he have died among strangers. He formulates the confession he will make when he gets home. He will not try to excuse himself for what he has done. He will confess it all, and ask for mercy. He will not even ask to be reinstated as a son in the home, but merely that he may be allowed a humble place among the servants. Did he think for one moment that he could ever be aught but his father's child? Perhaps, for children cannot understand the parent's heart, until they themselves become parents. And so the poor boy starts home, and a long, hard journey he finds it, for he lacks the magic talisman of money, by which travel is made easy and speedy.

At last he reaches the vicinity of home, and his heart beats faster at the sight of familiar objects. But his fear and agitation increase, likewise, for he can but wonder how he will be received, as he returns, ragged and hungry, to the home he has dishonored. Soon his eyes light upon the very home for which he has been yearning, and he can hardly wait till his weary feet can bring him there. But see! who is that coming to meet him? And with outstretched arms, too, and streaming eyes! "It is father!" he cries out, and in a moment more is locked in his arms, and feels the kiss of loving pardon on his cheek. Ah! did he not know that while he was starving in a distant land, that father was weeping at the window, and longing for his return? He begins to realize now how great is his father's love, and it makes his sin seem more unspeakable. He tries to utter the confession and prayer which he had formed in his mind. He says, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son!" Here he pauses. He cannot ask now, as he had intended, to be made a servant. With his father's arms about his neck, and his father's kisses on his face, he knows that the old relation is restored, and that he is in his own home once more. It does not need the clean robe, and the new sandals and the ring of gold, to assure him that he is welcome. And the fatted calf is not half so sweet a feast to his famishing body as is the love of his good father to his starv-ing heart. O, that all the prodigals might be persuaded to come back to God, and taste the sweetness of sins forgiven!

TOPIC FOR OCT. 28.

DO NOT WORRY.

(Matt. 6:25-34.)

There is one great principle which Jesus has im bedded in these words of his that is altogether worth living by. It deserves to be printed in large

"IS NOT THE LIFE MORE THAN MEAT OR RAIMENT?" Here is a man or woman who worries so much over the getting of a living-a certain style of living-as to neglect the really important thing-Life! If something must be neglected, let it be the food or the raiment, few of us need fear danger to life from lack of either, and let attention be concentrated on the Life.

Suppose, for example, one worries so much about not being able to wear clothes of a certain richness as to lose equanimity; such a one is losing something important to Life. Suppose another worries so much because the house he or she lives in is not in a "swell" enough neighborhood as to lose contentment; such a one is losing an import ant element in Life. Suppose another still worries so much because the food on his table is not of a certain degree of fineness as to lose happiness; such a one is sacrificing Life to food.

The illustration of the birds and lilies has sometimes been thought by most of us, no doubt, to be inappropriate to the present subject. Of course lilies and birds can't have the same fear for lack of sustenance that humanity can have! And yet, look closely at the Savior's beautiful, poetic, and at the same time convincing, illustration; isn't there sustenance enough in the world for everything and everybody? Why should humanity worry more than flowers and singing creatures? God cares for all, will provide for all, has made enough for all. If all men would pay attention to Life, the sustenance would be forthcoming. Let the Life but send out the fragrance of the lily, and the song of the bird, and you may be very sure that neither God nor men will allow the perfume or the song to cease.

The difficulty is that we do not pay so much attention to Life as to a living. The essential thing is not the shell but the creature within, not the locket but the likeness, not the plush box but the jewel, not the clothes or the dainties or the house or the neighborhood, but the Life! "Plain living and high thinking," or as Jesus' words indicate, "Plain living and sweet singing and perfumed doing"-these are the proper attitude toward the problem. The great difficulty with most of us is that we are not content with the scale of living which God grants us, and we want something more than Life, or rather something besides Life, but infinitely less worth while than Life.

Seek first the kingdom of God-that is, seek the largest, roundest, fullest Life-and the other things will come. "You mean that wealth and fine clothes and swell neighborhood." O, wait a minute. Jesus meant no such thing. He meant that food and raiment sufficient to content us would come; because the Life that is large, round, full, will be content. Children worry little. They are content -until they begin to learn from grown-ups-are content with rag dolls, calico dresses, pebbles and sticks of wood-and of such as these little ones is the kingdom of beaven. Turn a child loose in the great world of grass, and sand, and trees, and stones, and it will find Life. Why cannot we? Because God has hidden some things from the wise and prudent and has revealed them unto babes.

SABBATH OR LORD'S DAY

By D. R. DUNGAN, author of "On the Rock," "Moses, the Man of God." etc. It is a powerful argument against Adventism, and the observance of the Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, as the day of rest and worship. Dr. Dungan is a man well versed in the Scriptures, and gifted with sound sense and good judgment. He is a strong and convincing writer. This work should be placed in the hands of those who have been disturbed by the teachings of Adventists.

Six Facts For The Sunday-School Worker.

Fact Number One.

Sunday-School Supplies are recognized as the leading publications of the Christian Church, and the high standard of excellency which we have established during the Quarter of a Century of work in this field has won for us an enviable reputation, of which we are proud. Almost every school of importance throughout the land has used, or is using our Literature. Are you among the number?

Fact Number Two.

Some Ten Years ago we printed the first number of a promising and needed publication which we intended especially for the People. It met with an enthusiastic welcome everywhere, and time our subscription lists became larger and larger, for our workers recognized in it the very best paper of the kind in the field, devoted to The Sunday-school, The Home, and The Young People. It is needless to state that our lists are still growing, for with every issue the pages of this popular journal become brighter and brighter. Have you sent in your subscription? Don't delay. There is no time like the present.

Fact Number Three.

We have publications for all kinds of Workers. There is The Little Ones, for the very small people, The Sunday-School Evangelist for the boys and girls of the Intermediate Classes, and last but not the least by any manner of means, Our Young for the Young People. Are you a subscriber for any of these publications? If not, send for a sample of each one and begin at once.

Fact Number Four.

Successful Superintendent is sure to be the one that puts his whole heart in the Work and strives to interest his School in the Lessons. How can you better accomplish the desired results than by placing in the hands of all first-class Literature? We have just what you want and urge you to let us help you place your School on a successful Working basis. We think that we can do it, and respectfully ask you for a trial.

Fact Number Five.

Then there are the Quarterlies, or Lesson Magazines for The Youngest Classes, The Junior Classes, The Senior Classes and The Advanced Classes. The immense circulation of these four graded Lesson Magazines shows them to be among the very of the kind published, and you will be delighted with the Lesson Stories and the Helpful Readings, with the Explanatory Notes, Etc.

If you have not seen any of these Helps, send for Sample Copies at once. We are sure you will be pleased with them, and henceforth will not be without them.

Fact Number Six.

course you want to keep fully "abreast of the times," and the Superintendent teacher or pupil who has the benefit of our supplies will be fully informed on all matters of importance appertaining to Sunday-School Work. We want to number you among our subscribers and we earnestly urge you to take advantage of the splendid inducements we are now making for new subscribers. On the back of our order-sheet you will find our price list, and we think you will agree that our rates are very reasonable considering the very high standard of our publications. We assure you that of our periodicals are the result of long years of Editorial Experience, and the great facilities and resources of the foremost Publishing House of the Christian Brotherhood.

To the General Convention via the Christian-Evangelist Special.

There is a right as well as a wrong way of doing everything. The use of a little thought and of a little preparation nearly always makes a world of difference in almost any undertaking. An all-day ride on the cars is usually a tedious and trying affair; but it is not necessarily so.

In fact, it may be made an exceedingly enjoyable occasion. This is not a theory but a demonstrated fact. If you desire corroboration, ask any of those who attended the Kansas City Convention via the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Special.

The Burlington Route is noted for its fine equipment, and hence, when it is said that it placed two of its very best chair cars at the disposal of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and its friends, it will readily be seen that nothing was left to be desired in that direction.

Both cars were crowded before the convention city was reached. The fast train which carried the excursion party left Union Station, St. Louis, promptly at 9:02 A.M. The morning was bright, but not more so than the spirits of the members of the party, which came from all points of the North, East and South.

As the train glided along the smooth track which parallels the Mississippi River to Hannibal and then turns directly west across Missouri, delighted comments from the members of the party concerning the beautiful river and the no less beautiful country, were frequent and hearty. Very many realized as they had never done before the majesty of the "Father of Waters" and were convinced that the title of "Imperial Missouri" was not misapplied to the fifth state in the Union. Good reading was furnished in the shape of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST fresh from the presses of the Christian Publishing Co., visiting was indulged n and the air was made melodious with the old familiar hymns. The Burlington "railroad lunch" service, by means of which one i enabled to gratfy his appetite, whether great or small, was much appreciated |by all members of the party and added greatly to the comfort of the occasion.

The sides fof the chair cars bore large muslin streamers on which was inscribed this legend, "The Christian-Evangelist, St. Louis, Mo." and at nearly all the important stations waiting delegates made their way to join the party. As the crowd increased so also the enthusiasm grew. At Liberty, Mo., the train was held up by "White Caps," whose motto "Reception Committee" shone forth in blazing letters.

The party at once surrendered and threw themselves on the mercy of their captors. Instead of a calamity this reception committee turned out to be the "kaws" of great assistance to the party. They took charge of the delegates and piloted them to the First Christian Church at 11th and Locust St., where the headquarters of the convention are established and where delegates were assigned to boarding houses or hotels, as they preferred. It was a pleasant trip from the first "How are you?" of the morning until the hearty singing of "America" by the members of the excursion party as the train rolled into Union Depot at Kansas City exactly on schedule time.

Not an accident or unpleasant incident of any

Not an accident or unpleasant incident of any kind occurred to mar the enjoyment of the occasion and it is quite certain that all will wait impatiently for the next CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Special.

Hawkeye-tems.

As it is nearest to the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST and as the "pocket" is always the first consideration, we will begin these Iowa notes with a brief mention of our interests in the "Pocket City."

We have in Keokuk a goodly number of people—about 400—well distributed from the monument to the Indian Chief, whose name the city bears, in the beautiful park, overlooking the Government Canal and river, to the equally interesting point which affords a fine Missouri view, beyond the confluence of the rivers. If Keokuk accords as warm a reception to each of our people as it did to the man who tried to find them, very little of it will escape our influence.

We have a fine church building, admirably located. Bro. Sanderson is very popular and presents a worthy example, in the length of his pastorate. He is very ably seconded in his work by the veteran preacher, James Connoran, who is still quite active and not inclined to be shelved. There seems to be little to prevent substantial growth in Keokuk.

Passing the eight miles of canal, built and maintained by the government, at a cost of $5,000,000 and an annual expense of $30,000, athe town of Nauvoo, of Mormon fame, which certainly "beautiful for situation," we reach Famadison, where the Christian-Evangelist saw "day of small things," in the hands of Dan Bates. It is said that sixty per cent. of the pollation is Catholic. Our people have had a var experience and are still without a church home meeting in the court-room—but have purchas and nearly paid for a very desirable lot and ho to build next year. Bro. E. E. Lowe has recentaken up the work and, together with his peop is hopeful of the future.

If any of our people are passing this way warm weather, they will find it pleasant to trave with our gonial Bro. Capt. Peel, of the Steam Eloise, an elder in the Burlington church and mature member of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELI family. (The captain will owe us a ride for this

Burlington is decidedly Trinitarian, bei built on three hills—North, West and South. T most of our people are on South Hill, where to church is located. It does very well for a South Hill location, but we have quite a number of mei bers on West Hill and a few on North Hill, f whom it is inconvenient. Bro. N. G. Br. who rapidly learning the field and getting the condence and esteem of the people. There is but on problem which seems to a visitor to be difficult solution—that of location. It was suggested Bro. Brown to build up three congregations und a common management, one on each hill. The is an abundance of material and a fine opportuity to "provoke one another to good works."

It is quite apparent to one who visits the churches, and learns something of their condition and experiences, that the great need of the day not so much popular evangelism as a gospel systematic organization of the forces we have The suggestion of the Editor in the Christian Evangelist of Sept. 13th, with reference to thurches in Missouri, could be very profitably followed in Iowa.

Subscription Items.

The CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST grows in popularity and in the size of its subscription list.

The next best thing to attending the General Convention is to read about it in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST containing the essence of the convention proceedings was distributed at the convention hall bright and early Wednesday morning.

A series of interesting letters from Bro. Chas. R. Scoville begins in this week's issue of this paper. Bro. Scoville is making an extended tour of Europe, and his letters may be counted on as very interesting notes concerning his trip. You will enjoy them; so would your friends who do not now receive the paper. In this connection we will say that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be sent on 'trial for the remainder of this year for only twenty five cents. If ordered at once we will send all back numbers for October.

Minneapolis is to receive the up-lift of our General Convention next year. We have a word of suggestion to the committee on hall and arrangements, as follows: Use the columns of our religious papers to tell the brotherhood what is being done and interest them in making the convention a great success-we like to help in such work-but please do not forget the value of good literature and its great part in our missionary work when arranging for the sessions of the conventions. It is a greatly desired convenience to have the displays of literature under the same

This is a good time to interest your friends and acquaintances in the helpful pages of the CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST. We offer it on trial for the remainder of the year for only twenty-five cents. If they read it for that length of time they will very probably subscribe for it regularly January 1st, and of course that is what we are after. If a thorough canvass has not been made of your neighborhood will you not see that it is done at once? This is a rare opportunity to increase th knowledge and interest of our churches in th work for which we are organized.

Within a few weeks we will begin the publicatio in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of a serial story b Walter S. Smith, of Greenfield, Ind. It will, w believe, be found both interesting and instructive Our pages will be fairly exulting in good thing for months to come and admirers of good litera ture can scarcely afford to miss the feast. We are affording a solld foundation on which ou friends may safely build a large club of reader for the year 1901. We will send the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST to new subscribers until January 1: 1902, for only one dollar and fifty cents, or fo twenty-five cents we will send it on trial unt January 1st, 1901. We will send samples for distribution if you will promise to make a canvass

We have left a half dozen Dewey watches American Waltham movement, cases made o steel from the hull of the battleship Maine. Th steel in these cases is oxydized and makes a nea and attractive appearance. The watches ar good time-pieces and are valuable souvenire o one of the greatest naval tragedies of moder. times. They are guaranteed for one year. We hav disposed of a very great number and have only few left as stated. They are gentlemen's siznone of the ladles' watches remain. Five dollar. will pay one year's subscription (new or old) to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and secure one of thes valuable and handsome time-pieces. Sent prompt ly by registered mail. Send order at oace; if i arrives after all the watches are gone the money will be returned to you.

A Biographical and Historical Library

The best history of the Reformation of the Nineteenth Century—that reformation inaugurated by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, and so nobly carried on by them and their successors—is to be found in the stories of the lives of the pioneers. At the present time there is a revival of interest in the history of the Disciples of Christ. In view of this fact we make the following offer of a library of historical and biographical works:

LIFE OF ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

By GRAFTON. Cloth, 234 pages.

LIFE OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

By J. Franklin. Cloth, 508 pages.

LIFE OF JOHN SMITH.

By WILLIAMS. Cloth, 578 pages.

CURRENT EVENTS.

At a meeting of the miners' representaives at Scranton, the attitude of President litchell was more favorable to the acceptnce of the operators' terms than had been nticipated and the sentiment of the meetng gradually fell in line with his view. Mr. Mitchell commended the methods of the oft coal miners, who hold an annual meeting vith their operators and "like prudent, sensible men" agree together on a scale of wages or the year. By the resolutions which the onvention adopted, the miners agree to eturn to work if all operators will grant a O per cent. increase until April 1, and if he sliding scale is abolished in the Schuylkill nd Lehigh districts. Arbitration is reuested in case these conditions are not met. Most, but not all, of the operators have greed upon these terms. The making of he agreement until April 1 suggests that t is the purpose of the anthracite and ituminous miners to unite their interests, or upon that date the latter make their lew agreement for the ensuing year. With he miners of both hard and soft coal in greement, their leaders will be in a position, f they feel it necessary, to call the greatest trike in history.

Invitations have been sent to representalives of the Spanish-speaking republics of Central and South America to meet at Madrid in a congress for the discussion of comnercial and industrial questions. Spain is rying to regain a peaceful sway through rade over that vast territory which she cailed to rule by force. In the competition or the control of South American markets, Spain has many and great advantages. She as fixed her language, her literature, her social customs, her methods of trade and her modes of thought upon the Latin republics and these give her a natural ascendency among those peoples. The commercial congress in Madrid will make the most of these points and will endeavor further to make the Spanish Americans forget the former cruelty of Spain when she was their mistress and craftily to play upon their fears of American expansion.

The exchanging of diplomatic notes is a serious and time-consuming habit to which all the Powers have lately fallen victims. Following the failure of Germany's first note about the Chinese question to elicit favorable responses, came the second German note, to which substantially favorable replies have now been received from all the Powers, that of Great Britain being the last to arrive but not the least cordial. A French note has also been dispatched, in which six items are suggested for consideration. The reply of Secretary Hay is friendly and recognizes the substantial agreement of intention between France and the United States, but withholds judgment in regard to some of the details. The following points are included in the plan of settlement outlined in the French note: (1) The punishment of those responsible for the massacres; (2) the prohibition of the importing of arms; (3) the payment of adequate indemnities to states, societies and individuals for losses in connection with the late disorders; (4) the maintenance of permanent legation guards by all the Powers; (5) the disarmament of the Taku fortress; (6) the establishment of military stations on the road between Tien-Tsin and Pekin, to be held by the Powers as a further protection to their legations.

China is entirely ready and anxious to begin peace negotiations and has indicated her willingness by submitting plans for peace. The five points of the Chinese note resemble those of the French proposals. But while allowing the Powers to require guarantees for the payment of indemnity and the preservation of order, China requires the immediate withdrawal of the foreign troops. While negotiations are still in progress, Pao Ting Fu has been taken by the English, German, French and Italian allies. The recail of the German Minister, Baron Sternberg, from Pekin has been attributed by some to the fact that he favored a policy of conciliation, whereas the Kaiser and von Bulow favored a more rigorous policy, as indicated in the first German note. The Anglo-German agreement is the most reassuring piece of diplomacy which the week has brought forth. These two Powers agree explicitly that neither of them shall attempt to acquire Chinese territory as the result of the present complications and that they will unite to resist the efforts of any Power which shall make such an attempt. America has formally agreed to this arrange-

While the Powers are trading notes, China has apparently come to the conclusion that, as regards the punishment of the guilty, it is best to anticipate their formal demands. It is probably a direct effect of the second German note that the Chinese government has, by imperial edict, fixed the penalties for seven of those who led or encouraged the Boxers. Three are to be decapitated, three imprisoned for life, and Prince Tuan banished to the Siberian border. It is highly significant that the Powers have agreed with Germany that their several ministers shall judge whether the penalties are sufficient and see that they are actually inflicted. Minister Conger, at the request of Secretary Hay, has sent in a list of names of several Chine e officials who are notoriously implicated in the work of the Boxers. The list includes the seven who have already been sentenced and a rout ten more. The Chinese imperial court, in anticipation of the entrance of the foreigners into Pao Ting Fu, has withdrawn to Cheo Cheng. There is an indirect report that a body of European troops (probably British) has already arrived there. The joint expedition, composed of about 7,000 British, German, French and Italian troops, left Tien-Tsin for Pao Ting Fu late last week. The United States consistently maintains that the expedition is unnecessary and will delay the opening of peace negotiations.

On Monday of this week, John Sherman, lately Secretary of State, died at his home in Washington. The most appropriate trib ute is found in the President's proclamation: "Few among our citizens have risen to greater or more deserved eminence in the national councils than he. The story of his public life and services is, as it were, the history of the country for half a century. In the Congress of the United States he ranked among the foremost in the House, and later in the Senate. He was twice a member of the executive Cabinet, first as Secretary of the Treasury, and afterwards as Secretary of State. Whether in debate during the dark hours of our civil war or as the director of the country's finances during the period of rehabilitation, or as a trusted counselor in framing the nation's laws for over forty years, or as the exponent of its foreign policy, his course was ever marked by devotion to the best interests of his beloved land, and by able and conscientious effort to uphold its dignity and honor. His countrymen will long revere his memory, and see in him a type of the patriotism. the uprightness and the zeal that go to molding and strengthening a nation."

At his own request, Count Hohenlohe has been succeeded as Chancellor of the German Empire by Count von Bulow, who has been until now Minister of Foreign Affairs. The retirement of the aged Chancellor, who is eighty-one years old, may perhaps be due to his unwillingness to assume the responsibility for the Kaiser's Chinese policy. The German Emperor is in reality his own Chancellor in a large degree and whoever holds that office must either agree with the Emperor or be subservient. Count von Bulow is believed to be in full sympathy with the Kaiser's views on the subject of naval expansion and to have quite as little of the conciliatory temper. He is opposed to the Agrarian party and will, therefore, oppose those measures, supported chiefly by this party, which place restrictions upon foreign trade. He believes in maintaining warm commercial relations with all nations and especially with the United States. The new Chancellor is a younger man by thirty-one years than the former one and his experience so far has been confined almost wholly to foreign affairs.

Mr. Quay is again making a fight for the senatorship in Pennsylvania and this time, unfortunately, with a better prospect of success. Pending the election of the new legislature which will fill the vacancy in the Senate, he is stumping the state in the good old fashioned way and imploring the dear public to vote for the men who will vote for He is very genial and ingratiating now. He is not trying to "boss,' but is content to beg for support and is friendly to every promising candidate for the legis-Apparently he is winning back some of his old supporters who were frightened by the storm of a year ago and the bank scandal. His chief hope, however, lies in the absence of any united opposition. Mr. Wanamaker, who was the center of the opposition last year, has not yet recovered from a severe surgical operation, and no other opposing candidate has been found upon whom the anti-Quay elements can unite. Still there is enough scattered opposition to make Mr. Quay's nomination dubioue. A Republican landslide in Pennsylvania will probably carry him into the Senate, but less than that will give him trouble.

Many and varied as are the follies of John Al-xander Dowie and his disciples, they are not to be compared with the follies of some of those who are seeking by violence to prevent the spread of "Zion" both in this country and in England. At Mansfield, O., the representatives of this phase of divine healing have been prevented from entering the town to make converts, and the officers of the law have proceeded most lawlessly against the Dowieites. Manager Dowie himself is at present in Great Britain where his propaganda is being opposed in all sorts of legitimate and illegitimate ways. "Shadowed by Scotland Yard detectives, plotted against by physicians, reviled by the newspapers, repreached by clergymen and mobbed by riotous students," he is having a hard time of it, even without the hostile action of Parliament, which some have threatened. Mr. Dowie defies parliament in unparliamentary language. It seems strange that in this year of grace there are so many people who have not yet discovered that violent and lawless opposition and quasi-martyrdom lend wings to error quite as effectively as to truth.

In recommending a book of "Readings from the Bible" for use as supplementary reading in the Chicago public schools, the committee of the school board has done a. wise and sensib e thing. We would not be willing to admit that any part of the Bible ought to be excluded on the ground that it contains "sectarian teaching"-of which school boards are usually so much afraidbut some parts are obviously better than others for reading to school children and often the teacher is not fitted to make the wisest choice. The committee which has recommended this book is composed of both Protestants and Catholics, and of men who are not professedly religious as well as those who are. It remains for the school board to adopt the recommendation of its committee. The only weak point in the arrangement is that it makes the book "supplementary reading," that is, leaves it optional with each teacher to use it or not. If it is a good thing-and we agree that it is-it ought not to be left in the power of the individual teacher to nullify the action of the board.

In answering a question as to whom he regards the three ablest orators in each of the two great parties, William E. Curtis of the Chicago Record says he considers Benjamin Harrison the ablest orator in this country. After him, among Republicans, come Senators Frye and Depew. On the Democra ic side he mentions Mr. Bryan, Bourke Cockran and Senator Daniel, of Virginia.

A German editor, Maximilian Harden, editor and proprietor of "Zukunft" (The Present) has again been sentenced to six months' imprisonment in a fortress for speaking disrespectfully of the government. The objectionable article was called "The Battle with the Dragons." This is Harden's second offense. Last year he served six months for an article entitled 'Poodle Majesty," wherein he likened Emperor William to a poodle. The articles were suppressed as soon as they appeared and we have not had an opportunity to see teem, but the last-mentioned bears its contents clearly enough in its title. It strikes us as being a singularly inapt comparison, that between the Kaiser and a lap-dog. The former has his faults, to be sure, and he makes so little effort to hide them that they sometimes, like a cloud, obscure his virtues. But both his virtues and his vices are those of a bigger beast shan a poodle. Poodles, for instance, are generally indolent, whereas the Kaiser is one of the most energetic men in Europe. If Editor Harden reflects calmly upon his misdemeanor (as he will have ample time to do) he ought to regret that, since he must suffer, it is not to be for some more accurate and intelligent caricature than that of the "Poodle-Prince.

The government of Austria-Hungary has recalled its ambassador from the Vatican and there is nothing yet to indicate any intention of sending a new representative to the papal court. In the days when the Pope was a temporal prince with a considerable part of Italy for his dominion, it was reasonable enough for the other monarchs to send representatives to his court. But with the passing of the temporal dominion all excuse for that arrangement vanished. Still the custom has persisted more or less as a matter of tradition, habit and superstition. but it is tending more and more toward desuetude of the most innocuous type. Last year France recalled her ambassador, and now Austria Hungary, a far more staunchly Catholic country than France, is doing the same thing. Only recently the Austrian public schools were removed from clerical control, and certain laws have lately been passed countenancing civil marriages in Hungary, both of waich actions were somewhat bitterly resented in Rome. It is believed that the recall of the ambassador was occasioned by the temporary coolness growing out of this situation.

KANSAS CITY CONVENTION.

In our last issue we reported the Convention of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, together with a brief reference to the services on Lord's day. The program of the American Christian Missionary Society began on Saturday evening with two very inspiring addresses, delivered to packed audiences in Armory Hall. W. K. Homan, late editor of the Christian Courier, Dillas, Texas, presided over this and all subsequent sessions of the convention of this society. He proved to be a chairman of fine tact, good knowledge of parliamentary law, and made an excellent presiding officer. The first address of the evening was by John E. Pounds, of Cleveland, on "The Christian Endeavor Era." It was brilliant, epigrammatic, fresh, pungent, pointed. The second address was delivered by President E. Benjamin Andrews, of the University of Nebraska, on "The Place of the Church College in the American System of Education." It was a very able address. It was characteristic of the breadth of a man of letters and of wide experience in educational work that, al though president of a state university, he gave splendid and unanswerable reasons for the maintenance and endowment of colleges under the auspices of the various religious bodies. It is not always the case that those who are connected with church colleges or religious institutions can recognize the place which state universities hold in our educational system; but men of breadth of view in both state and religious institutions recognize no clashing of interests in the two kinds of colleges but consider them as cooperative educational agencies, each of which has its rightful place in our great educational system.

MONDAY.

The Monday morning session opened with a Bible study by Jabez Hall, who on this and the following morning presented an outline view of the Epistle to Ephesians. These two lectures were illuminating and inspiring. The president's address on "Greater America, the New Century, and the Paramount Issue," was delivered without manuscript, and was received with great applause by the convention. It was an able addresss, emphasizing the greatness of our country, the greatness of the opportunities of the new century and the greatness of the parameters.

mount issue now pending, namely, Shall the great forces of this mighty nation and of the new century be dominated by Christ for the welfare of humanity, or by the evil one?

Corresponding Secretary Benjamin L. Smith then presented his statement of the annual report, the substance of which we have already printed. This was followed by "Voices From Many Fields," by which the secretary desired that the convention should hear some of the appeals that come to the Board continually for help. The east and the west, the north and the south, presented their appeals through men who are working in these fields and who are acquainted with their needs. C. C. Smith reported for the Board of Negro Education and Evangelization. This work, as stated in last week's paper, has been transferred to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. It is probable that this transfer will carry with it Brother Smith, who seems to be inseparably connected with it, and who has given the problem more thought, perhaps, than any other man among us. We confidently expect an enlargement of this work under the management of the C. W. B. M. I. J. Cahill, of Dayton, delivered an address on "Puerto Rico," pointing out the condition and needs of that new island possession. The session at the Hall closed with a prayer meeting. Meanwhile a business session of the convention was held from eleven to twelve at the church, corner of Sixteenth Street and Forest Avenue, where Brother Kokendoffer is pastor. The only business dispatched at this session was hearing and acting upon the report of the committee appointed one year ago on the subject of education. To this committee had been referred an application from the Board of Education for a secretary. The report recommended that the Board of Education be dissolved, and that, instead, a National Education Society be formed, co-ordinate with the American Christian Missionary Society, and holding its meetings in connection with it, or with our National Congress, or at such other time and place as might be determined upon. It further recommended the appointment of a committee of seven, which would have the power to devise a plan of organization for such society, and to call a convention of the friends of education at such time and place as it might deem proper. This change met with universal favor, and it is believed will mark the beginning of a new era in our educational work.

The afternoon of Monday gave us three strong addresses. "How Shall we Fire the Hearts of our Ministry with the Home Missionary Passion?" was the theme of a most thoughtful address by J. E. Lynn, pastor of the church at Springfield, Ill. "The Educational Hour" was occupied by Professor J. D. Forrest, of Bulter College, with a very able and thorough discussion of the educational problem. Like President Andrews, he advocated the necessity of maintaining our religious institutions, showing that they filled a place that could not otherwise be filled. At the same time there was nothing in his address which antagonized state universities. "Our German Neighbors" was the theme of a very earness address by our German preacher of Cleveland, R. H. Timme. His plea for an evangelist among the Germans was referred to the committee on recommendations of the Board, and resulted in a recommendation that the Board appoint such an evangelist as early as practicable.

The evening ression, after devotional exercises, was also marked by two strong, practical addresses. The one on "The Most Popular Thing of the Reformation," by William Ross Lloyd, of Richmond, Ky., being a strong presentation of the claims of Church Extension, and the other on "The Urgency of the Plea for Home Missions," by C. J. Tanner, of Minneapolis. This was one of the best addresses of the convention, indicating the reasons why we should push the work of evangelizing America with all possible zeal.

THESDAY.

After the second lecture by President Hall on the Epistle to the Ephesians, A. J. Marshall, City Evangelist of St. Louis, delivered a strong address on "City Evangelization-the Overs adowing Problem of the Twentieth Century." F. W. Norton discussed very clearly and forcibly "The Adaptability of Our Movement to City Evangelization Work," and "The Relation of City Evangeliza ion to the Salva ion of Our Country and the World," was strikingly presented by C. G. Brelos. These addresses made it apparent that the problem of the city stands in the forefront of the evangelization of this country and of the world. G. W. Muckley presented an outline of his report of the Board of Church Extension, which more than realized the amount which had been planned for up to the close of the present century. He gave as the watchword, "A Half Million for Church Extension by 1905." A poem, written by Mrs. Wilkinson, of Hastings, Neb., was then read by Miss Worth ngton, and proved one of the "hits" of the convention. It was entitled "Boggess' Ride into the Cherokee Strip," and it celebrated in striking verse that ride under the auspices of the Church Extension Board. It has been promised for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. At this point in the forenoon session a business executive session was called in another building, but the following additional addresses were given at the hall, "Ministerial Relief; What Is It?" by Howard Cale. Bro. Cale makes an able and convincing plea for this fund, and he is a worthy successor of our beloved and lamented A. M. Atkinson. There was also an address on "Indifferentism; A Plea for Home Missions," by Wallace Tharp. It was a matter of regret that these latter addresses were not heard by those of us who were compelled to attend the executive session. The chief business of the forenoon business session was deciding the place of the next convention. San Francisco, Pittsburg, Buffalo and Minneapolis, all presented their claims for the next convention. The committee on nominations, and time and place, recommended Minneapolis, and after a spirited contest, in which the devices of parliamentary law were exhausted, Minneapolis came out winner, and a recommendation to make it unanimous was carried. The personnel of the various Boards remains practically unchanged. I. J. Spencer, of Louisville, was selected as the presiding officer of the next convention. A motion prevailed providing that after the present year the presiding officer of the convention and the vice-presidents are to be elected by ballet.

In the afternoon at the session at Armory Hall there was a conference on Sta'e Missions, conducted by S. H. Bartlett, and an address on "The Appeals that Come to the Board of Home Missions," by J. H. McNeill, and also an address on "The Initiative in our Mission Work," by J. M. Rudy, pastor of the church at Cedar Rapids. Those of us in attendance at the executive session, which was continued on Tuesday afternoon at Forest Avenue Christian Church, were not privileged to hear these addresses, but they were spoken of in terms of high praise. Most of the time in the business session was occupied with the discussion on one or two of the recommendations of the committee on the report of the Board. The "points of order" that were raised, the amendments and the amendments of the amendments, and the substitutes, with motions to "strike out," "lay on the table," and the "previous question" were quite bewildering. Evidently a little knowledge of parliamentary law is a dangerous thing. Drink deep of Cushing and Roberts or else remain in blissful ignorance of parliamentary rules. We are compelled to say that valuable time seemed to us to be wasted on matters of little moment so far as their practical effect is concerned.

We are almost disposed to call Tuesday evening the culminating session of the convention in its enthusiasm. The splendid address of Mrs. Louise Kelly on "Boys and Girls' Rally Day," and that of Chancellor William Bayard Craig on "The Adaptability of our Plea to America," lifted the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Bro. Craig was at his best, and when he is at his best, there is no one better. In our freedom from ecclesiastical tyranny and from the dominion of human creed, in our appeal to man's rational nature, as well as to his conscience, in our emphasis of the subject of Christian unity, and in the practical results of our evangelistic work, our plea finds a hearty response in the American people. This evening closed the sessions of the American Christian Missionary Society.

FOREIGN SOCIETY.

On Wednesday morning the Foreign Christian Missionary Society assembled, and after a Bible Study conducted by C. A. Young, on the Book of Jonah, from which practical lessons were drawn, the venerable president of the Foreign Society, C. L. Loos, took the gavel and called to order the twenty-fifth annual convention of the society. After a statement of the annual report by Secretary F. M. Rains, in his enthusiastic way, A. McLean read an historic address covering twenty-five years of history. The substance of this address we have already printed. This was followed by a very interesting feature, namely, the introduction of foreign missionaries, in which Brother McLean was master of ceremonies. As one by one these heroes of the cross were presented to the Convention, they were received by the waving of handkerchiefs and applause. Missionaries from India, China and Japan each saluted the Convention in the language of the countries they represent, followed in most cases, with a few words of hearty greeting. Following these missionaries, Brother Mc-Allister, who recently came among us from the Congregationalists, and a Dr. Nelson, who is pastor of an independent church in a suburb of St. Louis, were introduced to the Convention and spoke briefly, expressing their appreciation of the fellowship they had enjoyed in the Convention. At 11:15, J. M. Van Horn, of Ohio, delivered a very able address on "The Gospel's Unceasing Aggressiveness." Few addresses of the Convention, if any, made a deeper impression upon the people than this one. A. M. Harvuot made a stirring address on "Children's Day," abounding in valuable hints as to how to make it a success. Every one felt at the close of this forenoon's session that the Foreign Society had scored a great success in its opening session. In the afternoon the addresses were on "The Spiritual Expansion of Christendom," by S. T. Willis, of New York; "Stewardship," by L. M. Sniff, of Indiana; on "Adoniram Judson," by Albert Buxton, of Texas. The latter was the only address of the forenoon the writer was permitted to hear in full. It was a fine address in spirit, in literary excellence and in adaptation to the purposes of a missionary convention. It was too late in the afternoon when W. T. Moore, of Columbia, began to read his poem prepared in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Society, on "Heroes and Heroes." He only read selections from it, however, but the entire poem, printed in excellent style, was on sale at the Convention, and we hope many of our readers provided themselves with a copy. It was worthy of the occasion, and of the author, and will remain among his most enduring literary productions.

The report of the nominating committee omitted the name of C. L. Loos for President as heretofore, and presented the name of A. McLean. This, it is understood, was at the earness request of Bro. Loos. Bro. McLean will not discontinue his present duties, but will perform them as President of the Society. It might have been wiser to have had a President of the Convention different from the Chairman of the Executive Committee, as in the Home Society, but if these two positions are to be filled by one man, as they have been heretofore in the Foreign Society, no one is more competent than Bro. McLean. He is thoroughly conversant with the foreign work, and his heart is in it. At the close of the evening session, which was the close of the sessions of the Foreign Society, resolutions were offered and adopted, expressing the high appreciation of the Convention of the services of Bro. Loos as President of the Society, and our Christian affection for him. He has given us an example of active Christian service at a time of life when most men consider themselves out of active service. Bro. Loos, even yet, has no thought of retiring from active service, but his influence will be given, as heretofore, for the advancement of the work.

The closing session of the Foreign Society on Wednesday evening was occupied by addresses by returned missionaries: James Ware, E. S. Stevens, H. H. Guy, F. E. Meigs and Miss Josepha Franklin. Their hearts were too full of the work to say a tithe of what they desired in the limited time given them, but what they said was sufficient to show the value of their work and its success.

On Thursday the Convention was broken up into sections as follows: I. Christian Endeavor; II. Education; III. Pastors and Evangelists; IV. Conference on Benevolence; V. Sunday-schools. These all had good programs which we learned were carried out successfully. We cannot here report them in detail. We should be glad if any one attending these sessions could give at least an outline of the chief ideas or result4. We looked in on the Endeavor and Sunday-school sections but spent most of the time at the conference on benevolence. There was a fine audience at the latter, an excellent program with stirring addresses, and a deep interest manifested in the benevolent work being accomplished and planned for. Mrs. Meier, of this city, who with her husband had just arrived from a protracted European tour, reached the Convention in time to throw her enthusiasm into this conference.

CLOSING SESSION.

The closing service on Thursday evening was a Thanksgiving and Consecration service. Devotional services were conducted by H. A. Denton, of Missouri, and B. L. Smith, presiding, called on a number of brethren for brief addresses, after which the Convention adjourned to meet in Minneapolis in October next.

Thus ended the fifty-first annual convocation of the Disciples of Christ. In numbers present it excelled all previous conventions except, of course, the Jubilee Convention, at Cincinnati. There were probably five thousand persons in attendance. The chief drawback to the convention was the lack of a suitable hall. The Armory Hall, in which we met, was never intended for an auditorium and is not adapted for that purpose. Besides, it was too small to accommodate the audiences which desired to hear. We have out-grown church buildings for the use of our conventions, and must henceforth make a suitable hall an essential condition of accepting any invitation from any city. The newspapers of Kansas City disappointed us somewhat in the meagerness of their reports of the Convention. It can hardly be claimed that it was the demands upon their space of other interests more important which prevented them from giving fuller notices of the Convention proceedings. It is probably the result of a failure on the part of the editors of these papers to appreciate the magnitude of the Convention, the number of people it represented, and the importance of the work it is doing. The brethren in Kansas City did their part well, and a failure to secure a suitable hall was no fault of theirs. In spite of the unsuitable hall, however, and some confusion attendant thereupon, the Convention was great in numbers, in enthusiasm, in earnestness, in missionary zeal, and in unbounded hopefulness for the future. Its real value is to be seen, however, in the increase of the results of the ensuing year's work over those of the past year.

CONVENTION PERSONNEL AND COMMENT.

The oldest man in attendance at the Convention was the venerable Dr. Hill, of Mississippi, who was present, we believe, at every session of the Convention, day and night. He is upwards of ninety years of age and yet takes a deep interest in all the work of the Church.

Perhaps the most patriarchal looking man in the Convention was Dr. W. T. Moore, whom one of the papers characterized as "a patriarch with flowing white beard and an immensely long Prince Albert coat."

C. L. Loos, although asking to be relieved of the presidency of the Foreign Society, shows no signs of waning energy or enthusiasm for the work. He has learned the art of carrying his years lightly, and growing old not only gracefully but usefully.

It was good to see Governor Drake present in the Convention, and looking much improved. He is one of the pillars, not only of Drake University, but of all our missionary interests.

Kansas City has one of the most remarkable High Schools we have ever visited. The Central High School, of which Prof. White is the principal, has about sixteen hundred young men and women in it. Once a week they have an entertainment, and on two occasions they were addressed by representatives of our Convention. The editor of this paper addressed them on Friday morning, the 12th, and on the following Thursday morning they were addressed by Professor Willett, of the University of Chicago. This school had a graduating class last year of two hundred and eighty-seven, which is said to be the largest graduating class in any High School in the United States. Professor White has long been at the head of the school. Prof. A. F. Smith, who has charge of the English Department, is an old-time friend of the editor of this paper, having been associated with him editorially in the early history of the paper.

President Charles Carlton, of Bonham College, Bonham, Texas, was the only representative present of the first National Convention held fifty-one years ago. He is more than an octogenarian, but is still remarkably active and well preserved.

It has been many years since the genial face of Chaplain J. B. McCleery, of the United States Army, was present in ore of our Conventions. He has grown venerable in appearance, but still looks hale and strong, and has lost none of his interest in the cause with which he has been so long identified.

B. F. Manire, of Mississippi, Tennessee and Florida, is another of the young old men in attendance at the Convention and who was deeply interested in all its proceedings.

One of the pleasing features connected with our General Conventions is the meetings of college students and alumni of our various colleges. These were held this year as usual. We can speak from personal knowledge of but one of these, that of Eureka College, including the old students of Abingdon. There were about seventy-five present and it proved to be one of the most delightful reunions we have ever attended, and one of the most enjoyable in the history of the reunions of the students of this institution. The banquet was dispensed with, and the time was taken up with short, reminiscent talks of those present, with many an anecdote and incident out of the long past, which brought sometimes laughter and sometimes tears. President Hieronymus, N. S. Haynes, W. F. Richardson, Geo. A. Miller, President A. P. Aten, of Christian College, Harper, Kas., Mrs. T. R. Bryan, Professor Armstrong, R. A. Lovett and others were among those who spoke. The last-named speaker was an old Abingdon student, and kept the meeting in a roar of laughter with his references to humorous incidents of the past, and bits of his own personal experience. He is now a lawyer in Salina, Kas. There were a dozen or more graduates from Abingdon College present and one of these presided at the re-

Geo. T. Smith, of Winfield, Kas., once a missionary under the Foreign Society in Japan, and who has a grievance with the Executive Committee of that Society, which has been adjusted several times, tried to bring his case once more before the Foreign Board. As he was ruled out of order there, he brought a series of resolutions before the Convention which were declared to be out of order. He then read another resolution asking for a committee of arbitration, but the president replied that his case had been arbitrated once before at his own request, and in his own way, and that the result had been accepted by him, and that his request was, therefore, out of order. He appealed from this decision of the chair, and the Convention by unanimous vote, with the exception of one solitary negative, sustained the chair in its decision. Being thus defeated before the Convention, he went into the civil court and brought suit against C. L. Loos, President of the Society, and A. McLean, Corresponding Secretary, for $35,000 damages, and had subpœnas served on them. This action on the part of one who has been our representative in the foreign field is a matter of great surprise and of pain, too, to those who have believed in the sincerity and honesty of Brother Smith. In view of the fact that his case has been repeatedly adjudicated, and once by formal arbitration, his action is rendered wholly unjustifiable, and his suit will, of course, be thrown out of court. We have never made any mention of this matter before, and would not now had not the Kansas City papers given large space to it as a sensational matter, and that the probability is that the Associated Press will carry it throughout the country, and the brethren will not understand the meaning of it. One who refuses to abide by the decision of his brethren to whom he has appealed for justice, and who thus breaks covenant with them, divorces himself from the confidence and sympathy of his brethren until he repents of his wrong-doing.

J. B. Haston, pastor of the church at Galveston, made a statement to the Convention concerning the awful havoc wrought in that city by the flood and hurricane, which touched every heart. Out of a membership of about one hundred and forty they were able to gather about twenty after the storm. The most awful thing in the calamity, he said, was the feeling to which so many gave way, that God had forgotten them. Galveston, he assured us, would be rebuilt and more substantially than ever before. In response to his appeal, which was in great good (aste, upwards of $500 was raised by a collection taken on the spot, and by an offering made after the communion service at the hall on Lord's day. This amount, it is estimated, will repair the church and put it in condition for use. Brother Haston has himself lost everything, and while he was too modest, of course, to make any appeal for himself, the brethren should remember him, nevertheless, and see that he is fitted up as well as he was before. We shall be glad to co-operate with the brethren in replenishing his library with anything we have in stock.

hour of Prayer.

SAVING OUR STATE AND NEIGHBORHOOD.

(Matt. 9:35; Acts 9:31; 18:7-11.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Oct. .)
CENTRAL TRUTH. The gospel works like leaven:
individual touching individual, neighborhood touching neighborhood, and state touching state, and is designed thus to leaven the whole world.

Jesus had come into the world to preach a universal gospel, adapted to all men, and to all ages. His aim was nothing short of universal conquest, and yet we read in the passage cited above that He "went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness." With an aim world-wide and age-lasting, He, nevertheless, visited particular cities and villages in the neighborhood where he was, availing himself of their synagogues for teaching and preaching the gospel of the kingdom. In connection with this work of teaching he cared for men's bodies as well, "healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness." The latter was not the end which he had in view, but was a means to an end, and was used both as a means of expressing the divine compassion toward men, and of opening the door of opportunity for the preaching of the gospel.

There is no patent since Christ's day that supercedes the necessity of personal visitation to the cities and to the villages, with the old message of God's redeeming love in Christ. There was divine wisdom as well as good common sense in the method adopted of using the synagogues of the Jews and preaching to the chosen people first this message of the kingdom. This was following the line of least resistance. The Jews had greater preparation for receiving this message than any other people. It was the part of wisdom, therefore, to begin the work among those best prepared to receive it. We do well to observe this principle in all our mission work in both the home and foreign fields.

When the apostles began the work of preaching the gospel under the great commission, after the resurrection of Christ, they seem to have observed the same method of beginning at the center and working out in widening circles. Jesus had told them that when the Hily Spirit had come upon them, they should be his witnesses, "both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria and unto the uttermost part of the earth." (Acts 1:8.) And now we read in Acts 9:31, after the conversion of Saul, "so the church throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria had peace, being edified; and, walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, was multiplied." The church, beginning at Jerusalem, in Judea, had extended north into Galilee and Samaria, finding a better preparation for the gospel even among Samaritans who had a knowledge of the Jewish law and of the prophecies than among other Gentiles.

The further working out of this method of spreading the gospel is illustrated in the passage cited from Acts, eighteenth chapter. Paul, having offered the gospel to the Jews, who seemed to despise it, departed from them, saying, "From henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles." The record continues: "And he departed thence and went into the house of a certain man named Titus Justus, one that worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue." Thus the gospel went from province to province, from house to house, from neighborhood to neighborhood, from Jew to Gentile, all the while seeking the hearts most ready to receive it. When Paul grew discouraged, the Lord, appearing to him in a vision, assured him that he had many people in Corinth who were ready to receive the truth when they should hear it, and so "he dwelt there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them." If there had not been a readiness to receive the gospel on the part of many in Corinth, Paul would have gone to some other city with his message. God offers men salvation, but He does not torce it upon them. If they do not accept the offer of the gospel, He would have His messengers turn to those who are ready to accept it.

All this seems to accentuate the value of our local, neighborhood and state work. There are people within easy reach of our local churches in neighborhoods destitute of preaching, which can be reached by individual c ngregations; there are districts more remote, that require the co-operation of churches; there are cities whose spiritual needs are so great that it requires the united effort of the churches of a whole state to operate effectively upon them. We are not to neglect these home fields because they are home fields, but should naturally give them the first opportunity of accepting the gospel, that they may co operate in the work of world-wide evangelization. To the extent that we weaken our state co-operations, we weaken the general work and lessen our capacity for reaching the heathen nations. There is great practical wisdom, therefore, in building up the home churches, in strengthening weak and struggling congregations and enlisting them in co operative service, and in planting new churches in neighborhoods and communities where but little work is required to accomplish the end.

The time is at hand when most of the states lift their annual offerings for the work of state missions. This work is fundamental in all our missionary plans. It is to be hoped, therefore, that no pains will be spared to impress its value upon the churches and to raise a liberal offering for the needy and destitute portions of the various states which are calling for assistance. Nor let us forget to pray for the missionaries and evangelists working under the auspices of our state organizations, who, in isolated fields and often under very discouraging circumstances, are seeking to establish the kingdom of God.

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, our heavenly Father, for the leavening power of the gospel of Thy grace; that when planted in human hearts its influence is seen on the life and character. We thank Thee that Thou hast entrusted us with this glorious message of salvation through Christ. May we be faithful in carrying it to others-our children, our neighbors and all those around about us who are ready to receive it-and even to those who are afar off. Help us to be faithful to the obligations we owe to our home-land, and to the destitute fields within our own states. that the gospel, firmly planted in this fertile soil and bringing forth an abundant harvest, may be sent hence to distant, perishing nations. Above all may we be so filled with Thy spirit that all who come in contact with us may be brought into touch with the power of the gospel, that thus Thy name may be glorified, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

There are a few things we need to cultivate in order that the gospel which we hold and teach, and presumably embody in our lives, may make a better impression upon the world. One of these is good manners, by which we mean a conscientious regard for the rights of others. One of the speakers at our late convention was moved to say in the beginning of his speech, "Remember the rights of a speaker." We are sorry to say that this was not always done. The speaker is entitled to an attentive, respectful hearing. He has prepared his address with a view to its being heard. This is impossible in a large hall unless the people keep quiet. A great many people unthoughtedly violated this rule of good behavior. The construction of the hall made it difficult not to violate the rights of the speakers, but it should have been done, nevertheless, even at the cost of social enjoyment. It ought to be sufficiently self-evident that visiting in the rear part of a hall, or other building in which religious services are being conducted or in which public speaking is going on, is a grave impropriety which cannot be indulged in without violating not only the rights of the speakers, but the rights of all those who wish to hear. This violation of good manners is not intentional, but is the result of thoughtlessness, persons doing it being often unconscious of the interruption and disorder which they are causing. It is possible, however, to cultivate good behavior at conventions as one of the fine arts.

There is another matter closely akin to the above, but even of graver importance. A devoted Christian missionary from the foreign field who was present at the convention at Kansas City came to us at the close of the communion service, held at one of the churches, and besought us to urge upon the Disciples of Christ generally an improvement of their behavior in the house of God. The apparent lack of reverence in the audience assembled to break bread in memory of Christ's death so grated upon her feelings that she was compelled to go out of the building for a little quiet communion with God, to prepare her spirit for the proper observance of this institution. Before the announcement of the first hymn there was the hum of voices throughout the building, not loud and boisterous, of course, but sufficiently audible to disturb religious meditation. After the announcement of the hymn and the beginning of the public service, there was, of course, the utmost decorum. It is the time intervening between entering the church and the beginning of the public worship where the lack of reverence among us is so frequently manifested. Often while the solemn tones of the organ voluntary are calling the people to worship, this subdued conversation goes on, to the great disturbance of those who feel the need of these few moments of quiet to prepare their hearts for public worship. Preachers would do well to call the attention of their congregations to this subject, and to seek to cultivate in them the spirit and habit of reverence in the house of God.

The matter of applause in our conventions needs a little study. There is a lack of discrimination here which often jars upon good taste. A soloist is invited to sing a song. It is, of course, a religious song, and, presumably, is intended as a part of the worship. A good soloist who can lift all hearts nearer to God by the sentiments and the sweet melody of the hymn, assists materially in the public worship; but if it is a part of the worship, ought it to be followed by the clapping of hands, as if it were a mere musical performance? Why, then, may we not with equal propriety applaud an earnest and eloquent prayer or sermon? It may be difficult to draw the line between what should be applauded and what should be received without applause, but everyone knows that there is such a line to be drawn, and that what is offered as public worship to God should not be applauded by men's hands. Sometimes, too, a mistake, or slip of the tongue, is applauded quite as demonstratively as the loftiest sentiment. ought to be some way of distinguishing between what is merely humorous, and vhat we desire to endorse as a principle or policy. We are not inveighing against applauling in our conventions, but we submit that there is a little more discrimination needed than is often observed. All these things which we have mentioned above seem to us to be worthy of our attention, looking, as they do, in the direction of that good order and decorum which the very spirit of our religion

"Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things."

William W. Hopkins.

It has seemed altogether proper that since our Bro. W. W. Hopkins severs his editorial connection with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with this number, after a faithful service of six years as assistant editor, we should give our readers a view of his face, which we do this week on the first page of our paper. Brother Hopkins is an Indianian by birth, and was reared on a farm. He taught school when yet in his sixteenth year, and entered the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis (now Butler College), where he was both room-mate and class-mate of Geo. E. Flower, of sainted memory. Ill health compelled him to leave college near the close of his junior year. He began his minis erial labors in Minnesota in the summer of 1869. From there he went to Wisconsin, where he did some missionary work for five years, preaching the gospel and supporting himself mainly by teaching. While in this field, he was married to his present wife, Miss Losina Adams, a descendant of John Quincy Adams. He returned to Indiana from this field on account of sickness and financial reverses in his father's family, and later went with his parents to Kansas, whither they migrated in search of a new home. He labored in that state as evangelist and pastor for a time, and came to St. Louis in 1885 in connection with a business enterprise. He became a temporary supply for the Second Christian Church, then at Eighth and Mound streets, and remained with them as pastor for many years. Six years ago he became associated with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, having previously written for its pages frequently under the title of the "St. Louis Pen." Our readers will be glad to know that he will continue to furnish a St. Louis letter for our columns.

We have found Brother Hopkins to be a true yoke-fellow, amiable, industrious, and loyal to his convictions of truth. His ability as a writer is well known to our readers. Our best wishes go with him into whatever field of labor he may enter.

OUTWITTING FATE.

L. H. STINE.

While sitting in a conference of ministers and educators, the other day, in the city of Bloomington, a conference called in the interest of a higher education among our ministers, my mind was turned to the embarrassing problem that confronts my ministerial friend who took his academic degree from a college not many months ago, but who is without money and opportunity to pursue graduate studies in one of the great universities. He would gladly pursue such studies, for he sorely feels the need of them and appreciates the value they would be to him; but on account of the sport of potent circumstances, he is debarred from the privileges of the university. Shall my friend, therefore, become the wretched follower of a hope forlorn? Is a young man of ability and promise, like my friend, doomed to the fate of thinking and of speaking from a level lower than that of his more highly favored brother whom fortune greets with superior smiles? Must be deplore his helpless doom, and must he be the fickle ball fo wind and wave, stern fate and time, to play upon? By no means. He is not doomed to walk on a lower plane; he can control his fate. With his high soul aloft, looking beyond both clouds and tomb for a shining mark, he will laugh at fate and will shut it out.

What can my friend do to outwit the plots of frivolous circumstances, to the end that he may become a preacher of accomplished learning, and of vivid, appropriate and persuasive speech? Much every way. He should look hopefully toward the higher things and should have confidence in the integrity of his mind which is the essence of heroism. He may become the architect of a brilliant intellectual fortune, and may carry his ministry to the highest point of efficiency and success. It is in the interest of my friend's higher education that I write this article; an education whose costly pearls he is compelled to gather without the stately walls of a great university.

The first step my friend should take toward the goal of higher learning, in my judgment, would be the committing to memory of the four Gospels, the epistles of Paul and the epistle to the Hebrews in the Greek language. This much of the New Testament at least. Should the labor of committing the Greek Testament to memory appear an Herculean task, let him not be deterred therefrom, for the reward of the struggle will be of priceless value and will yield the largest returns. Frederick W. Robertson committed to memory the Greek epistles of Paul while dressing of mornings. With a Greek lexicon, Winer's grammar of the New Testament and Burton's Moods and Tenses, without spending a dollar on commentaries, except it should be on such as comment critically on the Greek text, my friend will have a sufficient outfit for the intelligible consignment of the Greek Testament to his memory, the warder of his brain. Gifted with a retentive memory and endowed with a genius for toil, as my friend is, he will find a delightful possibility in such a patient endeavor. The intellectual culture produced by the presence of the Greek Testament in his mind and the consciousness of the literary and spiritual authority accruing to him from so signal an achievement will be a rich reward for his heroic deed. In addition, the Old Testament would supply each day with a perpetual source of rational pleasure. He would lose his mind in the brilliant imagery of Job, the most splendid creation of Hebrew poetry, and he would plunge headlong into the literature of Solomon and Sirach, and the lyrics of David and the odes of Isaiah would he rapturously seize as delicious pleasures.

Placing the Bible in the midst thereof, my friend should put Shakspere on one side and Tennyson on the other. Now he is under the tuition of two masters. He has found his teachers. Hardly will he listen henceforth to ordinary men. I trust he will be content no longer with the instruction of lesser lights.

Shakspere will teach him the value of his memory; how to use the shapeless mass of materials that lie about him, whether of myth, or fable, or tradition; how to draw continually from all the fountains of knowledge, for Shakspere owed debts in all directions, and, notwithstanding his admonition against the habit of borrowing and lending, was the largest borrower in the history of English literature; and also how to radiate the truth and to bring every intellectual jewel in his office and every fine sentiment to the people who wait for light and inspiration; how to create and how to clothe the creature of legend or of thought with form and sentiment. Shakspere will teach him how to harp on many strings. He will save him from peculiarity of opinion, or of oratorical conduct, from eccentric and importunate topics. Shakspere will not permit my friend to become sectional, or provincial, or national, for he will show him how to include the world in his horizon. He will teach him the art of weighing the relative value of truth, and how to speak greatly on great matters and subordinately on questions of minor importance. Shakspere will open his eyes to the splendor that plays over the visible world and will teach him how to discern the larger meaning of oak, or rose, or peach, or hill, or sea, or star. What should my friend do with Shakspere? Transmit him to the table of his memory; work him into the texture and fiber of his soul.

Tennyson will teach my friend how to express himself on the platform clearly, beautifully and nobly. Daily will he bring his heart into contact with the breadth of human sympathy. He will show him how to be strong and steadfast and great in faith in an age of doubt, and how to give expression to immortal love. He will point out to him the difference between a simple faith that lives and works and grows, and the creeds of men that are antiquated, superannuated, and outgrown by the progress of ideas. He will teach him how to cheer, to sweeten and to elevate human life, and how to apply the balm of hope to the sinful and the sorrowful, that will lift the suffering man above himself and will make him a wiser, a better and a happier man. Daily will Tennyson illustrate before his eyes the art of approaching and of telling the truth. In Memoriam and the Idylls of the King he should commit to memory, with as much more of Tennyson's writings as possible.

Another name belongs to this faculty of masters, it is the name of Byron. Byron will teach my friend how to use his gift of liberty; how to apply his energy and how to comprehend life's purpose and aim. Byron will show him how to give magnificent expression to the sentiment of history and how to realize the conception of humanity in the multitudes, for he is the greatest modern preacher of "liberty, equality and frater-Byron will show him how to grasp the material universe and how to identify himself with it, and through the creation with God of whom lily, or raven, or cedar, or pendant rock, or mountain, or sea, or sun, is a holy symbol, a sign between God and man. Though wearied out by the emptiness of life, Byron will teach him the vanity of raising the cup of ignoble pleasures to one's lips. He will bring him into contact with impulses not wholly literary, and will open his eyes to the present century and will exhibit artistic creations that throb with the life of the current year of grace. As long as the combat of faith deepens, my friend also a struggling combatant in the arena of strife, will need Byron's impetuous vehemence and the stormy play of passion that mounts and swells and thunders in the tenpest of his verse. Let him commit Childe Harold to memory, and let him learn the diction of Byron and his use and swing and sweep of language.

Other voices with the authority and show of truth occasionally will inflict new pains of inferiority upon my friend as he fearlessly seeks the higher learning, and will remind him of what ills of want, of toil, of envy and of tears assail him. Wordsworth will teach him the things that are really essential in nature; how to assuage, to reconcile, to console the afflicted, and to add sunshine to the noonday, by making the happy ones happier; how to inspire young men and young women to see, to think and to feel; how the mutual adjustment of the external world and the internal mind is able to transmute the "simple produce of the day" into a paradise; how to enlarge the understanding, to widen the spiritual vision and to move the sympathies of the heart. Wordsworth will teach him the art of idealizing the vast creation around-an animate presence intermingling with our works and "breathing grandeur upon the very humblest face of human life.'

Bryant will conduct my friend often upon the theatre of nature where Wordsworth displayed the majesty of simple feelings and humble hearts, where is played in endless round the drama of life. Burns will teach him tenderness, warmth and pathos. Coleridge and Keats will develop his imaginative quality, while Longfellow will convince him how beautifulit is to love and will teach him the power of a deed to overtake a flighty purpose.

Along with the pursuit of these sublime studies at the feet of the masters, the whole sphere of reading pours its crystal stream of history, of science, of myth, of legend, of religion, of theology, of philosophy, of criticism, of poetry, of travel and of fiction into the expanding mind of my friend. All things now belong to him against whom, unfavored by fortune, the doors of the great university stood closed. With the Greek Testament in his memory-stamping the Greek image of Christianity upon his mind; with the sunny gems of Hebrew literature impearling the flower of his thought; with the produce of the great English masters wrought into the structure of his mind and summoning into council the vital thoughts of ages past, my friend has secured an intellectual and spiritual equipment with which to perform the function of a preacher when he rises in his pulpit, which is his throne, that venerable Harvard cannot give him.

Were my friend preparing himself to teach geometry, or chemistry, or technical theology, these masters would not serve his purpose, though yet for culture they would be indispensable; but the gospel of grace concerns life,-life at the hearthstone; life behind the plow and with the reaping hook in hand; life at the forge and in the mine and behind the counting-desk; life in its pains and life in its pleasures; life in its defeats and life in its victories; life in its temptations and life in its deliverances; life in its dark despair and life in its shining hopes; life in its midnight of adversity and life in its noonday of prosperity. Through whose voice can my friend more effectively speak to the human heart on themes so great with clearness, power and persuasiveness, than through the voice of the great masters who learned in suffering what they teach in song?

The poets are the teachers of mankind, and to find the truth, and in its adequate environment, one must interrogate the brave poets who look up Godward and speak the truth as it should be told, and keep back nothing. Having learned the language of Tennyson, my friend can deliver his message to the peasant and the king and both will listen to his story and will understand him. Tennyson speaks the language of the heart in every key, and a message with the drapery of his discourse about it will wing its way straight to the heart. This is the reason the language of Jesus was direct and powerful—it was gracious—the language of the poet.

My friend will now be able to avoid the common ruts of life that catch many of us and instead of taking the husk for the grain, he will be found taking the initiative and beginning life anew. He will never become a slave to the opinion, or whim, or conceit, or freak, or caprice, of any man; he will keep pace with the energy and march of sublime events, and will be prepared to meet the issues of his time and to answer the questions of his day.

It must be steadily borne in mind that such a course of study for intellectual and spiritual training is by no means intended to qualify my friend for technical work in the ology, or Biblical criticism, much less for that ambitious enterprise of exploring the archives in search of the genesis of the history and doctrine of the Disciples—as he must visit the university a few weeks for such pretentious, if not momentous, work; but to prepare him to stand in the presence of the people and before princes and judges of the earth and, with skilful tongue and unaffected grace, to proclaim the message of immortal love with beauty of diction and vividness and persuasiveness of language.

Does my friend deplore the dull prospect of theological training? If so, let me assure him that, in the course of his reading. he will get quite enough of the sweet pabulum of theology for his intellectual and spiritual support; and further let me assure him that, for his spiritual nourishment and for his intellectual support as a preacher whose function it is to deliver a message of love, to translate doubt into faith and despair into hope, the influence of the Greek Testament in his heart, the embellishment of his mind with the wisdom and discipline of the Hebrew classics and the imbuement of his brain with the elegant literature and the invisible and powerful influence of Wordsworth and Byron, of Tennyson and Shakspere will supply him with more nutritious food than all the theologians that ever wrote Augustine to Anselm, and from Aquinas to Schleiermacher.

Let my friend be of good cheer and let him hope to the end. His hours are lucky. His bold heart has stormed at the gates of fortune, and has conquered its supreme desires. He has outwitted fate.

HELPFUL HINTS TO BEGIN-NERS IN BIBLE STUDY.

BY PETER AINSLIE.

You can know just as much about the Bible as you want to know. It is a revelation of the mind of God and in it he has revealed to us as much of his own mind as the human mind is capable of grasping. The acceptance of all its truths combines to make a full-orbed mind—just such as God wants every human being to have. It holds the most precious secrets, and these will be given up to every one who searches its pages with diligence and prayer. No book is so charming and no theme so uplifting as that of this one and best book. God is its author, truth its theme and salvation its end.

1. In its study every one should have a suitable Bible—not one too costly for every-day reading, nor too small print, so that you can read it only by the sunlight, but one of good print, well bound, medium size, containing maps and other helps, and if possible the Revised Version. In fact, if you must choose between the Revised Version and the helps, get the Revised Version and get your helps elsewhere. If you already have a Teacher's Bible, it will be only an additional cost of twenty-five cents to one dollar to procure a well-bound copy of the Revised Version of the New Testament, or two dollars for the whole Bible, or more, according to the style of binding, but by all means use for your daily reading and study the Revised Version.

- 2. Do not be afraid to use your Bible and give no thought about keeping it clean, although it is supposed that it will not be soiled unnecessarily. It is the truth you are after and not the paper that makes the pages. That paper is no holier than any other paper, and for a trifle you can get another Bible when that one has become too soiled for use, but the information from those pages is what the soul is athirst forsuch information as was said of it and it "Thy word is truth," and "It shall only: stand forever." Practice carrying your Bible to church, especially to the prayermeeting and the Sunday services, and make use of it there as opportunity may offer itself. Make it a living companion.
- 3. Read it often and you will have laid hold of that promise which is, "Blessed is he that readeth," but especially study it as you would your mathematics or Latin. The command is, "Search the Scriptures," just as one who is working a problem in mathematics or translating a sentence in Latin, or, having lost something, every piece of furniture in the room must be removed to find that which is lost. God's word no more quickly gives up its secrets than other lines of study. Emerson rightly said: "This world belongs to the energetic," and it is so with the study of God's word. It belongs to those who combine their energies and surrendered wills to its mastery.
- 4. If one is so situated, it is well to have a certain time for the study of the word; but if circumstances be against this, be determined to get some time for study, and be sure to get it, for your life depends upon it. It is your spiritual food and the soul must have it. It is significant that in the oldest book of the Bible-at the very beginning of writing-Job should have said of God: "I have estremed the words of his mouth more necessary than my daily food;" and Jeremiah said: "Thy words were found and I did eat them." The Christian's failure to grow is due either to the lack of appetite for the Bible or if, having the appetite, he does not take the time to gratify it. This is supreme. The soul should be fed as regularly and as continually as the body.
- 5. Memorize as much of the Bible as possible and say it to your own self frequently. Argue with yourself for a holier life on this basis. Do not memorize the Scriptures simply for prayer-meeting talks or to meet others in argument, but do this for your own salvation. Plant the word right in your heart and, like a careful florist, keep it growing. It is the greatest bulwark against sin. "Thy word have I hid in my heart that I might not sin against thee," said the psalmist. This is the divine remedy and it cannot fail. Take the Sermon on the Mount for an example. This can be easily gotten to memory and the daily re peating of it, even in part, brings God more largely into human life. For a long time

I have practiced saying this as soon as I retire at night and with equal diligence I practice saying it immediately on awaking in the morning. I have found this to be an incomparable mental purifier. It may appear as a trifling practice to bring into one's life, and it is a small matter, but it has brought great blessing to me.

- 6. Find out the purpose of each book in the Bible and the circumstances surrounding its composition. No Scripture can be fully understood without inquiring: By whom was it written and to whom? When was it written and where and why? These questions are necessary for us in order to understand anything men may write, and they are no less necessary in understanding what God has written, for the same laws of interpretation that apply to a clear understanding of other ancient books apply to the Bible. Not only in the Old Testament, but many of the epistles are far from comprehension without a strict adherence to these rules. The books of the Bible, especially the epistles, should be so studied that one would be able to give a general outline of the book, perhaps getting to memory verbatim some special verses, but making it all very brief, and mark the verses that you have come to love and that have become to you living sentences. Refer to these frequently and usually in the connection with which they were used.
- 7. Make a careful study of those lands which have been made so sacred to us because of Bible history. Not only study the map, but practice map drawing until you are able to make a general location of the places mentioned in the Scriptures, especially those mentioned in the New Testament, otherwise those names of cities and countries and rivers and mountains will have no meaning to us. This part of Bible study is too frequently neglected. It is very important. It locates facts and so makes them more real.
- 8. Remember that the first law of Bible study, which in fact is the law of all other branches of knowledge, is to practice what you learn. You know that this is an essential rule in the study of grammar, mathematics and everything else and it claims the very first place in Bible study. The promise is very simple: "If a man shall do his will he shall know of the doctrine." Without doing you cannot know. Everything that the Bible commands you must try to practice, just as you do in obedience to the laws of grammar and rhetoric in the hope of being able to speak and write in purer English. This is vital and Bible study is of no practical value unless we enter wholehearted into the practice of all we learn. In this way, and this way alone, are the secrets of God open to the human heart. "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."
- 9. You must not expect to master the Bible in a year nor several years. You did not do that in the study of Latin, which was written by men. God is the author of the Bible and the highest knowledge lies hidden in its pages. It is a life-long study, every day the word getting sweeter and the great world it opens getting larger and more beautiful, until, like Kepler, we shall exclaim: "O, Almighty God, I am thinking thy thoughts af er thee!"

10. Never forget at any time in your reading that the Bible is the living word of the living God, so always be reverential, for the Almighty Father is looking over your shoulder as you read and study and flinging new truths across your pathway and opening new pictures before your vision, and after awhile you begin to realize that God and you are friends. All this will have come to you through your diligent and reverential realing of the word and your constant practice of it.

In the study of the Bible the very flowers of God blossom around you and you smell their fragrance, and the art galleries of heaven have their doors thrown open before you and you wonder whether you shall enter, but already you will have become annexed to the heavenly kingdom, for "the kingdom of God is within you;" and so the purpose in the Bible has been met in your life, for the Man of the Book has become the living Jesus in your heart. I know of none other purpose of the Bible than this.

PREACHERLESS CHURCHESS AND CHURCHLESS PREACHERS.

BY J. W. LOWBER.

I believe the following causes largely account for preacherless churches:

- 1. Many of our churches do not understand the true position in the church of pastor-elder, who labors in word and doctrine. In the apostolic church the territory of the local church was the territory of the city. We read of the church in Jerusalem and of the church in Antioch. The Antiochan church at that time, according to Eusebius, had one hundred thousand members. Of course, it had a number of places of meeting, and consequently a plurality of pastors or elders who labored in word and doctrine. The pastor should never be separated from the eldership. If this were better understood many of our pastorless churches would feel more the nocesaity of having pastors to feed the flock of God.
- 2. There are too many unconverted and restless people in our churches. We have gone ahead of all others in our scriptural and practical method of evangelization. From this fact, our increase in the past decade has been marvelous. In many of our churches you will find that the children above eight years old have been baptized. We sometimes come very near to infant baptism. When a person is prepared in mind and heart, I believe in baptizing, even the same hour of the night; but as a people we should be a little cautious and not baptize persons before they are ready. In Texas we number three members where the Presbyterians have one, but in the capital of our state and in some of our leading cities they number three to our one. Their suc cess in pastoral work largely accounts for this. We are far ahead of them in the evangelistic field, and I am certain that we are now gaining in the cities.

- 3. Many churches have not wisely trained their members to Christian liberality. We are not as liberal as were the ancient Jews. We are strict in reference to some ordinances and neglect others. God has ordained that those who preach the gospel should live of the gospel. Our churches should not neglect this ordinance. The contributing is part of the fellowship, and disciples who neglect this are certainly not in good fellowship.
- 4. Many of our churches fail to distinguish between pastor and evangelist. Of course, a pastor may do evangelistic work, and an evangelist may do pastoral work, but that is not what I mean. It is a fact that many of our churches try to employ every good evangelist for their pastor. The really successful pastor is turned off and the evangelist is put in his place. In a short time the evangelist finds that the work does not suit him and he goes into the field. The result is a pastorless church.
- 5. Some pastors leave churches for which they preach without using their influence in securing a successor. They even leave factions in the church. This is wrong. Preachers should be above envy. They certainly should not be like the cow which gave a good pail of milk and then kicked it over. Preachers should be loyal to their divine mission.

We have considered the question of preacherless churches, and will now give some attention to churchless preachers. I believe the following to be the principal causes of so many churchless preachers:

- 1. Our colleges do not sufficiently train young preachers for pastoral work. Much attention should certainly be given to the training of those who are to be the elders ordained to labor in word and doctrine. The great eastern theological seminaries have chairs devoted to pastoral theology, and in this way preachers are trained to feed the flock of God. They may not always give the sincere milk of the word, but they are certainly well qualified for pastoral work. Our people can learn something from others along this line. No pastor can succeed who does not preach from house to house.
- 2. Many of our preachers are too restless and are not satisfied to let well enough alone. I have known preachers who were doing well, but changed for what they thought to be a larger field, and the larger field ruined them. Some of them are yet churchless preachers. When there is a vacancy in a city church nearly all the applicants are already well located. They simply want to do better, and will not let well enough alone.
- 3. Some of our churches persuade young men to prepare for the ministry when these young men are not at all adapted to the work. Some time ago I met a young man who had graduated in one of our leading institutions, but failed as a preacher and became an infidel. As a business man he might have been an active Christian worker in his local congregation. I thank God that I have baptized a number of young men who have become preachers, but I want no young man to enter the ministry unless it is of his own free will and accord.

4. Many of our young preachers are not becoming well enough educated for the ministry of the 20th century. Of course, some may do great good with a limited education but considering the educational tendencies of the present age, our young preachers will certainly have to reach for a higher standard.

5. I believe we should have a bureau of information connected with our state boards. Of course the corresponding secretary should be a member of it. It would greatly assist him, for the work now falls on him alone. Of course, this bureau could only be advisory and could not in any way interfere with the freedom of either the preacher or local church. The tendency in this age is extended liberty in both church and state, and I have no fear that anything will contravene the liberty of our local churches. Both church and state are now in more danger from anarchy than from despotism. It is certainly our duty to do what we can for our prea herless churches and churchless preachers. Both parties deserve great sympathy.

ROGER WILLIAMS AND RE-LIGIOUS LIBERTY.—IV.

W. H. ROGERS.

Roger Williams has been termed a "picturesque figure in early American history" by one of John Milton's biographers.

He was the protege of Sir Edward Coke, the distinguished English lawyer.

Williams learned to hate the encroachments of arbitrary power when he saw his illustrious friend and protector sent to the Tower for resisting the royal prerogative.

Though Coke was a great lawyer, he was of a somewhat rancorous disposition, from whom Roger Williams might learn independence of action, but not suavity of manner.

John Quincy Adams characterized Roger Williams as "conscientiously contentious."

From some one else he received the sobriquet of "Arch Individualist." A disturber he was, but such a disturber seems to have been needed in those days when no one could sit as a deputy in the General Court who did not hold to the orthodox creed. Henry Dunster, the first president of Harvard College, was compelled to resign his position because he conscientiously refused to bring his chili to baptism.

Here is a man, thoroughly possessed by a twentieth century idea, running up against seventeenth century customs.

We do not marvel that he was so impatient, but that he was so patient.

More than once Mr. Williams' persecutors came to him apologetically.

John Cotton, "the unmitted pope," besought Williams, after the sentence of banishment was passed, not to withdraw his favor and affection, though Cotton was one of the leaders against Williams. John Winthrop, the first governor of the Massachusetts Bay colony, wrote to Williams afterwards: "Sir, we have often tried your patience but could never conquer it." Again, it seems that popular opinion, so far as it dared to express itself, was with Roger Williams, for John Cotton states, "Williams' positions were so well taken as to threaten the authorities with serious embarrassment, and to force the court to retrace their steps, and desist from that proceeding."

Godliness was a feature of Williams' character so prominent, and yet so genuine, that friends and opponents looked up to him with fear and respect, and the court sought by every possible means to avoid the sentence of banishment for fear of the people.

John Cotton further sought to soften the austerity of the sentence by saying that Mr. Williams was not banished, he was simply "enlarged" out of Massachusetts.

Certainly the banishment resulted in Williams' enlargement. A grand idea always enlarges a man, and if his environment is too small, if the creed, or the church, or the state is too circumscribed, then the man who is possessed by that enlarging idea must simply get out.

As Rev. Mr. Merriman says: "The sentence of the court was not recognized by the British Parliament." "Mr. Winthrop wanted it revoked." "Cromwell authorized him to trample it under foot," and gave "safe conduct for him to go through all the colonies at all times."

When Williams went to Rhode Island, he made such an honorable and satisfactory contract with the Indians as made the Indians his friends, and would have made Williams himself rich in lands and worldly goods for all time.

But such a consummation did not happen to fall in with the mission for which Roger Williams was raised up, namely, the founding of a free state. And so Roger Williams died a poor man, but the statues both in Providence, R. I., and in Washington, D. C., commemorate his memory as one of the founders, or, as some would say, the Father of Religious Liberty in America.

It must be remembered that one reason for the troubles in which he became involved was that he denied the right of the King of England to cede away the lands of the Indians to the American colonists. Williams had great power over the Indians to pacify them, and in the case of the Pequot war, he was the instrument in the hands of God for saving the lives of his former Massachusetts persecutors from destruction at the hands of the Indians.

Williams has often been spoken of as the founder of the Baptist Church in America. His connection with the Baptist Church was a minor incident. He soon withdrew ecclesi astical fellowship, though he continued to preach and remained in closest spiritual fel lowship with the church and with his successor, Rev. Chas. Brown, the pastor.

Like many another great religious leader, neither his work nor his sympathy could be confined to any single denomination.

Great men and great movements reach beyond all denominational limits.

The Baptists have little more reason to claim Roger Williams than the Methodists or Congregationalists, for his movement was not only inter-denominational, but international and universal in its scope.

As one grows into the intensity and the largeness of the love of Christ, his denomination becomes simply the platform on which he stands, and from which he labors to build up the universal kingdom. Dwight C. Moody was, and F. E. Clark is, connected with the Congregational Church only in a formal way, for the sake of convenience, order and example, but they in reality belong to no denomination.

Roger Williams did not feel the need of even that formal connection. It is thought that some lingering confusion of mind concerning apostolic succession led him to separate himself from any local church or ecclesiastical affiliation. It certainly was not factions, opposition, or any such discreditable motive that guided him.

It has often been the case that the Church has been too narrow, too cold and formal, for the progress of a great reforn, or for some great advance movement; and men filled with the Spirit of Christ have not found the Church large enough for the expansion of that Spirit of Christ.

It is sad when the Church becomes too small and conventional for the sympathies and activities of her Divine Guest. The Holy Spirit is less jealous of any particular form of organization, though it be one of its own appointment, than it is of the opportunity to work through any form of organization which shall most effectually do the work needed to be done at a given time or at a given place.

The forms of the Church must not be so unyielding as to repress the ever-abounding and ever-pliable life of the Church. Men seem to think they are loyal to Christ when they are holding on tenaciously to forms from which all life has departed, but he is most loyal to Christ who is fullest of the life of Christ, not most tenacious of the forms of Christ.

In these letters I have conceded the assertions made concerning Roger Williams as a u an of crotchets, ultra imperious and somewhat given to tangents.

It should be stated that many of his bicgraphers refuse to admit these assertions. Indeed most of the dozen biographies which I have consulted with more or less care allow nothing of the kind. Oscar S. Straus says that "though he was a positive, active, aggressive man, yet the wrath and enmity he provoked he never shared; the sweetness of his temperament remained unruffled through all his trials; spitefuloess and revenge were foreign to his character; he was ever ready to return good for evil." It is known that in some important exigencies he did make concessions to his opponents.

Still further, we may well concede that Roger Williams' persecutors were in many instances as conscientious and God-fearing, and as devoted to the welfare of humanity, as Roger Williams himself. There was rife at the time a spirit of insubordination which would not yield to anything but s ern civil and ecclesiastical control. Even men like Williams, and movements like his, needed some curbing, and developed more healthily for the repression by civil and ecclesiastical authority. Liberty grows best under restraint, and the fetters which bind should not be snapped too suddenly. Why reproach our Puritan ancestors for not bounding at once into the spirit of toleration and moderation that has come to us by two hundred years of growth? As Haw-thorne says: "Let us thank God for having given us such ancestors; and let each successive generation thank him not less fervently for being one step further from them in the march of ages.'

East Milton, Sept. 19.

Our Budget.

- -"Echoes of Convention" next week.
- -Now for another year of progress.
- —From the mountain-tops to the casting out of devils.
- Let us gather up the fragments of the Kansas City Convention—the most precious fragments for the benefit of those who were not there.
- —If you were present at the National Convention send us in not more than about one hundred words, the best or most helpful feature or sentiment of the convention as you heard it. Do this at once, and in this way help to publish the good things for those who could not be present. Use a postal-card if you prefer.
- —In this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is repeated for the last time the two great book offers of the Christian Publishing Company—the "Biographical and Historical Library" of ten volumes for $5.00, and the "Home Library" of fifteen volumes for $5.00. Both these effers expire October 31st, and those who intend to take advantage of them should not delay a day longer. Both these offers have been very successful. Some of our patrons have ordered both sets. All purchasers have been delighted with the books. For full description of these sets see advertisements elsewhere.
- -The article on Bible Study this week under the auspices of the Bethany Reading Courses' management is by Bro. Ainslie, of Baltimore, Md., and will be found fresh and invigorating. Bro. Ainslie is a vigorous writer and has an inspiring theme and has written worthy of himself and of the occasion in this article. This series of articles promises to be the best that have yet appeared for the management of the Bethany Reading Courses and their influence for good will be incalculable They ought to call into existence many new reading circles Every Endeavor Society that has not a reading circle ought to look into this matter and begin the work at once. Dr. J. Z Tyler, of Meveland, Ohio, will be glad to farnish you with explanatory literature
- -We are giad to report the relief of the First Christian Church in Lincoln, Neb., from the great burden of debt which has so long rested upon it and hindered its work. Elsewhere in this paper will be found a letter from the pastor, T. J. Thompson, giving the facts and figures in the case. And the local paper of the church for October is filled with encouraging conditions. There is probably no more important work in the United States at present than the Lincoln work; its success means far more than the mere success of a local congrega tion; it means incalculable good to the cause throughout the state. No church was probably ever confronted with graver financial problems and conditions, and now that it has succeeded it ought to bring hope to other languishing churches. Faith and perseverance will get the victory.
- -According to the Herald and Presbyter seventy-nine Presbyteries have expressed themselves as favoring a change or revision of their creed. While this count includes over half their Presbyteries yet they express so many shades of thought on the subject that it is not likely that any radical steps will be taken in the immediate future on the subject. The situation seems to stand about as follows: One-third of the Presbyteries oppose any action; one-third favor moderate revision, while the remaining third are divided in their views. It seems, however, from this count, that the trend of thought in that great religious body is toward revision and with no visible signs of a reaction of sentiment in the movement revision is one of the inevitable futurities of that Church.

- —W. E. Harlow, of Parsons, Kan., is assisting E. T. McFarland, pastor of the Fourth Christian Church, this city, in a protracted meeting. The meeting has been in progress two weeks and 32 additions are reported to date. Bro. Harlow is a a plain, straightforward gospel preacher. His sermone abound in apt illustrations and scriptural quotations. He gets at the facts in his theme and strikes for the hearts of his hearers. The common people can understand readily. St. Louis is a peculiarly hard field at best for evangelistic work and the Fourth Church is located in one of the peculiarly difficult fields, but the constant presentation of the gospel after Bro. Harlow's earnest fashion is making its mark.
- -On last Sunday at 3 P. M., W. E. Harlow gave an interesting lecture on Christian Science at the Fourth Christian Church, this city, to a full house The first part of the lecture was devoted to an exhibition of the vagaries and absurdities in Mrs. Eddy's famous book on Christian Science. The latter part of the lecture was devoted to an elucidation of Hudson's theory of psychical phenomena, and was exceedingly interesting and profitable. Bro. Harlow has given this matter much study and is well prepared to lecture on the subject. He has gathered up a large book of facts from his own observation and personal investigations, and clearly illustrates the duality of the human mind in control of the physical body. Christian Science, he says and shows, is neither Christian nor scientific, but having stumbled onto the law of suggestion is enabled thereby to perform some cures, and to this he attributes, and that correctly, its success. In his lecture Bro. Harlow shows that suggestive therapeutics is available for many valuable uses by any who will inform themselves on the subject without resort to greatly advertised charlatans who seek to rob the people. The lecture put all the phenomena of mental science where they belong-in the field of science. He takes off the religious mask which some have thrown over it and gives you the facts upon their merits. It will do any church or community good to hear Bro. Harlow's lecture on Christian
- —Brethren visiting St. Louis, desiring to secure board, will find a pleasant place with Mrs. J. D. Dillard, 1128 Leonard Ave., this city. It is near two car lines and about two blocks from Central Church. Rates reasonable. Address the above number.
- —It is reported that a woman has invented a machine to measure a man's capacity for affection. If so, we pity the average young American, but we tremble for matrimony. But happily the practical success of the machine has not yet been guaranteed or even demonstrated.
- —The plan of taking up one study at a time in the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses, is proving very popular. The English rible is now the subject of study; the plea and history of the Disciples will be taken up January 1, and world-wide missions will be taken up April 1. Readers may enroll at any time. W. B. Clemmer, of Clarinda, Ia., says: "The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses are the most timely movement in our brother-hood of recent years. It must go and grow."
- —T. H. Blenus, the pastor of the Adams St. Christian Church, of Jacksonville, Fla., is contributing weekly articles to the fimes-Union of that city, the leading paper of the state. The following are among the recent articles contributed by Bro. Blenus: "Time-Wasting," "Institutions Peculiarly American," "Impure Literature," "The Relation of Our Literature to Our Morals," "The Educated Man," "The Lord's Day and Primitive Christianity," "The Preacher's Attiliade in Politics," "Gold Worshipping."

Scrofula

This root of many evils-

Glandular tumors, abscesses, pimples and other cutaneous eruptions, sore ears, inflamed eyelids, rickets, dyspepsia, catarrh, readiness to catch cold and inability to get rid of it easily, paleness, nervousness and other ailments including the consumptive tendency—

Can be completely and permanently removed, no matter how young or old the sufferer.

Hood's Sarsaparilla was given the daughter of Silas Vernooy, Wawarsing, N. Y., who had broken out with scrofula sores all over her face and head. The first bottle helped her and when she had taken six the sores were all healed and her face was smooth. He writes that she has never shown any sign of the scrofula returning.

—J. F. Berkey, pastor of the Church of Christ in Monroe, Wis., is taking a very active part in politics this campaign. He is working for the Prohibition party. It is pretty hard to find a preacher among the Disciples of Christ who is not a Prohibitionist and it requires no strain on the conscience for them to work for the only political party that stands squarely and solely on a moral issue.

-On last Friday evening the Endeavor Societies of the Church of Christ in St. Louis held their union quarterly meeting in the First Church. The meeting was well attended, all of the churches being represented. Bro. Burns presided and Bro. Pittman led the song service. After devotional exercises the meeting listened to reports of the Kansas City Convention by the editor and by Bro. McAllister. These reports were then followed by an address from C. E. Hill, our State Superintendent of Christian Endeavor in Missouri. Bro. Hill is pastor of the Church of Christ in Pleasant Hill, Mo, and was present by invitation of the St. Louis C. E. Societies. The meeting of the Endeavorers on Friday night was followed by another of the Juniors at the Central Church on Saturday afternoon, which was also attended by Bro. Hill. Both meetings were profitable and greatly

-Now that the national conventions are over and have added enthusiasm to the churches it is time to arrange for Rally Day in our Bibleschools for Home Missions. This day ought to be to Home Missions what Children's Day is to Foreign Missions, but this will not be without great interest in the work and more energy on the part of preachers, churches and schools in preparing for it. The fruits of the next Rally Day will go largely to the first year of the next century and it ought to be worthy of the occasion. There will be a great effort on the part of all religious bodies to begin the new century with new energies and larger offeringe, and we, as a factor in the religious world, cannot afford to be in the rear. With such a plea as we have our banner ought to lead the procession in all good works in the opening year of the 20th century of the Christian Era. Let Rally Day be generally and generously observed throughout all the churches.

-D. W. Campbell, of Camberland, Ia., writes that he can put a good young preacher, with small family or single, with good references, into a very pleasant work with two churches four miles apart, one in a town of from 800 to 1,000, the other in the country. Half time at each place, salary from $600 to $700. Address him with stamp.

-J. Z. Tyler, of Cleveland, Ohio, is writing a series of articles in the Christian Monthly on "Recollection of my Richmand Pastorate." The Christian Monthly, published in Richmond, Va., is, by the way, a new magazine of marked ability, edited and published by Julian C. Anderson. The articles of Dr. Tyler are therefore peculiarly fitting for such a magazine, as well as peculiarly interesting.

-Dr. H. L. Willett, Errett Gates, D. B. and W. D. MacClintock, A. M., of the Disciples Divinity House of the University of Chicago, have prepared a course of lectures, each for the purpose of carrying to the churches and colleges of the Disciples of Christ the course of instruction given in the University of Chicago by members of the Church of Christ. Such course is designed to cover one week, with one lecture a day, or half a week with two lectures a day. All correspondence concerning terms and dates for either of the courses should be addressed to Errett Gates, Disciples Divinity House, University of Chicago Either course would be a spiritual uplift to any congregation.

-J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Tex., very much regrets that he did not know until it was too late that he was appointed to preach on Sunday morning at Independence, at the Kansas City Convention. He would have considered it both a pleasure and an honor to preach for ex-President Cave and to occupy the pulpit so long occupied by Alexander Procter, the sage of Missouri.

-The following note speaks for itself. It has the spirit of life and progress in it. It would be well for the cause if all our preachers could say as much.

"We are strictly missionary in word and deed and I ventilate the mission work wherever I labor and we have paid all our apportionments."-ELD. H. H. RAMA, Maitland, Mo.

-J. H. Allen, President of the Allen-West Commission Co., one of the largest firms of cotton brokers in this country, has issued a circular letter to the patrons of the company in the South, in which he takes occasion to boldly declare himself on current political issues. He had received many inquiries as to how he intended to vote, and having declared himself in favor of expansion and bimetallism, he adds:

As we greatly differ with both the old parties on their main issues, we expect to vote the Prohibition ticket, for we think the great imperial power that is ruining this country and others is King Alcohol. Both the old parties bow down and worship him and dare not in their platforms say a word against him, though they both know he is costing mo e lives and money and bringing more sorrow, distress and poverty into the world than any other one thing. And when a timid Conthan any other one thing. And when a timid Congress passes a law against him, the executive will not enforce it for fear of offending the liquor-But both the old liquor parties will learn there is a moral element in this country with which they will have to reckon. We think it is a crime against God and man to sell the heathen abroad and the ignorant at home strong drink or opium, and an enlightened government ought to forbid the traffic, for nothing but truth and right-eousness will finally triumph. So we will vote for the right, even if it is now in the minority. The writer, the president of this company, is alone responsible for these views.

Some of our readers no doubt will differ from the opinions expressed above, but they will all honor the man who believes that "nothing but truth and righteousness will finally triumph" and who prefers to be in a minority with the right, rather than with a majority in the wrong.

-From a letter from Bro. J. F. Callahan, of Noble, Ohio, we quote the following interesting information:

I am quite well-rugged; but dread our lake breezes and climatic changes of the winter season, so have about completed arrangements to go to Eastern Kentucky with R. B. Neal to help preach, stir up and build up. Our son Errett went Sept. 2d (as electrician) with a company to Bering Sea to lay a cable from St. Michaels to Cape Nome. The boat—Origaba—was wrecked on a rocky reef with water rising in hold and the instruments, passengers and part of cable were removed by lighter to St. M. (six miles). By last report it was doubtful about saving the boat and the "Senator" may bring passengers, etc., home to a ait spring and more favorable weather for ca ble laying.

Personal Mention.

J. A. L. Romig reports 22 additions to date in their meeting now progressing in St. Paul, Minn.

W. F. Folks has changed his field of labor from Petosky, Mich, to Clarksburg, Ind.

G. A. Ragan, of Irving Park, Chicago, could be secured on reasonable terms to hold a meeting during January.

The church at Sullivan, Ill., has extended a call to Baxter Waters, formerly pastor at Central Church, St. Louis.

All personal communications for W. W. Hopkins should hereafter be addressed to Kirkwood, St. Louis County, Mo, instead of this office.

Ben F. Hill reports 55 additions to date in his meeting at Union Star, Mo. The meeting was to close on last Sunday night that he might meet his next engagement.

On account of conflict in dates J. M. Lowe can be had for a short meeting before beginning his work at Waukegan, Ill., Nov. 18. His present address is 1209 31st St., Des Moines, Ia.

L. C. Swan, pastor of the Church of Christ in Mt. Ayr, Iowa, reports $1,261.94 raised for all purposes. An excellent church rally was recently held and the outlook for the future is bright.

C. P. Evans, of Arapahoe, Neb., announces himself ready to respond to calls for evangelistic work. He states that he can go anywhere in Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri or Kansas.

M. J. Chandler sends a good report of the church in Elinburg, Ill. Everything is flourishing under the pastoral care of J.S. Rose, who is greatly appreciated for his work's sake.

A. L. Ferguson, of Augusta, Ill., says they expect to dedicate their remodeled church building some time in December next. The cost of repairs changes, etc., will be about $3,000.

J. T. Boone, pastor of the First Christian Church at Jacksonville, Fla, accompanied by C. W. Zaring, of his congregation, was in attendance at the Kansas City Convention. Bro. Boone will return to his church after a month's vacation.

C. M. Kreidler began his work in Milwaukee, Wis., Oct. 1, and at last reports there had been six additions to the church. The prospect for a successful work is bright. C. M. Kreidler went from North Tonawanda, N. Y., and his Milwaukee address is 342 Greenbush St.

S. D. Dutcher, of Mexico, Mo., is assisting S. B. Moore, pastor Compton Heights Christian Church, this city, in a protrated meeting which began on last Sunday. Bro. Dutcher and Bro. Moore will make a strong team and we shall expect to hear of a good meeting. The Compton Heights Church is in a field where evangelistic work is not only needed but where good and permanent results may be expected.

D. L. Dunkleberger, of Marion, Ia., states that according to ag eemert with the church he is at liberty to hold a meeting in November or December and would be glad to hear from churches any where wanting a meeting. He says that owing to the financial condition of the church there he may be compelled to give up his work in Marion. Owing to the indebtedness of the church it may have to employ a man who can work on a smaller salary. For further information address D. L. Dunkleberger, Marion, Ia.

R. L. Cartwright, pastor of the Christian Church in Dover, Ky, paid his respects to this office on his return from the Kansas City Convention. Bro. Cartwright is not only a reader of the Christian-Evangelist but sees that it goes to others for their adjoint on and configuration. for their edification and comfort. It is somewhat unusual for a preacher returning from a convention by way of this office to extend his subscription for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on a cash basis, but this is what Bro. C. did in his call We commend the church that sees that its pastor attends a convention with cash for expenses, missions and good literature.

A Parting Word.

My relation to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as assistant editor closes with the present issue. The six years of service in this capacity has so greatly endeared me to the office, the editorial staff, the great family of readers and to all with whom I have had such pleasant associations in and about the Christian Publishing Co. House, that the parting will not be without pain; but this will be greatly modified by very pleasant memories. During all these years no unpleasantness has occurred to mar the pleasant relations which have existed toward all with whom I have come in contact by word or pen, or with whom I have been associated as a co-laborer in the production of over three hundred numbers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I am therefore leaving the work with good will toward all and malice toward none.

The Christian-Evangelist is a great religious journal and I shall always count it an honor to have been associated with its editor as an assistant in this work. As stated at the first I entered upon this work with no reforms in the spirit, plan, or purpose of the Christian-Evangelist to advocate, but simply to be an assistant to the editor. My chief desire was to assist in realizing his ideal of a religious journal and trust that, in some degree at least, my efforts have not been in vain. I have made mistakes, but these have been so kindly borne as to make me the greater debtor to all for their fo: bearance.

While the ideal of the editor of the Christian-Evangelist has not been realized, he has sought to improve the paper each year and in this respect the Christian-Evangelist will continue to grow. Our separation from the editorial staff will in no wise hinder its growth and usefulness. What we have been doing will be taken up by more efficient hands and the great work will go on until its mission be accomplished. The man who is to succeed me in this office, Dr. W. E. Garrison, is not a stranger to our readers and needs no introduction from me. You are already familiar with his name and pen, and in this work he has my heartiest commendation to you.

Not being so situated as to accept of the pastoral care of a church anywhere at present I have accepted a position in the Professional Co-operative Society of America, believing that I can be of service to my fellowmen therein, and thereby as well to make provision in part for the wants of my household. But of the nature and purpose of this Society I shall tell you later. It will be sufficient at this time for me to assure you that it is not my intention to quit the ministry of the gospel. I shall continue to preach as copportunity comes. Therefore with the kindliest of feelings toward all and praying that love, mercy and truth be richly multiplied in all our hearts, I beg to remain, Most fraternally yours in Christ,

W. W. HOPKINS.

Your Last Opportunity.

Elsewhere in this issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be found repeated for the last time advertisements of "The Biographical and Historical Library" and "The Home Library." These offers expire with the close of October. This is our last chance to direct the attention of our patrons to these wonderful offers, and the days remaining in which the offers may be accepted are very few.

About five weeks ago the offer of "The Biographical and Historical Library" was first made.

The offer immediately made a hit. Frankly, we received more orders for the Library than we expected. We are rejoiced to know that there is such a widespread interest in the history of our reformation, as that history is told in the lives of the men who were pioneers in the movement. The purchasers of the Library have been, without exception, delighted with the books. We have received many letters of thanks. A fair specimen is the following, written by Geo. C. Ritchey, Keota, Ia.:

Dear Brethren:—The books arrived all right. They are fine! I cannot see how you can sell them so cheaply—$5.00 fcr ten well-bound volumes of history and biography.

If you have so far neglected to send your order, it is not yet too late, provided you send at once. If your letter is post-marked on or before October 31, we will fill the order.

At the beginning of the present month we made the offer of our great "Home Library"—fifteen volumes for $5.00. This offer, also, has been received with favor, as it deserved. Many orders have been received and purchasers have been delighted with their bargain. We chose the name "Home Library" because this set of books contains something for every member of the family—fiction, history, science, poetry, religion.

If your order has not already been sent us, we urge you to turn to the descriptive advertisements of these two sets, and carefully note what it is we are offering. The time is very short, and if you wish these volumes at this low price, you must not delay.

Correspondence.

On Old Ocean.

The last alarm had sounded, hurried farewells had been given when at exactly five o'clock Saturday morning, August 25, our good ship left her moorings at the Hoboken pier and, amid the shuffle of ropes and planks, the loud commands of officers, the sound of Nation's music—national airs by the band—the laughter and tears of friends and lovers, waving of kerchiefs and salute of whistles, sailed down the New York harbor. Alas for some a sad farewell.

We had provided ourselves with silk flags which we propose to car; y throughout our journey of 17,000 miles, and while others waved farewell with hands and kerchiefs, I said, "Boys, here's to Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean." And as I saw a new meaning in those words, I felt a new pride and added, "steam ahead."

But a few moments later and I felt vastly different. I was standing alone; my mind had reverted to my old home and I thought again of the parting sermon delivered on Sunday at Newville, Ind., where I accepted Christ, preached one of my first sermons and baptized my first convert; then of the reception that last night at home by the Butler Church; then of mother and a group of dear friends at the midnight hour waiting for the train that was to carry me out into the night and away from them possibly forever. Scores of letters had been received and hundreds of good-byes spoken, but up to this time no tears shed. But when the time for the train was almost at hand that blessed mother instinct gave way, and with her head upon my shoulder in heavy sobs she gave vent to the pent-up feelings we both had tried to conceal. Truly a boy's best friend is his mother. I wanted to speak but found I could not control my voice. The heart strings were straining and I realized more than ever that-> "There are moments when silence, Prolonged and unbroken, Is more expressive by far Than any word spoken"— and words gave way to more expressive silence. But on this the curtain must fall and in recognition of the kirdness shown, I must mention the grand far well reception tendered me by the Pittsburg Central and Allegheny First Church in the parlors of the latter. Many, many more prayers were pledged and the well wishes of all given me, and as they sang—

"Smite death's threatening wave before you, Keep love's banner floating o'er you," etc.,

I could only think as I looked at the great audience how utterly unworthy we are of all He bestows upon us in the journey of this blessed life.

As we left the room for the depot all stood and sang "Jesus, Savior, Pilo' Me," and it was of this I was thinking when our boat passed Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, and I was delighted to think that I was soon to see the home of the French people who presented us this mighty work of art impersonating the ideal—the freedom and equality of the masses and the kingship of the common people—the greatest legacy of the last century.

At eight A. M. we passed Saudy Hook, and here the pilot who had thus far directed our ship's course through busy harbor, was transferred to the pilot boat awaiting him.

A rope ladder was let down the side of the boat, a small yawl came alongside manned by two sturdy sailors; the pilot quickly descended the ladder and dropped into the boat and at the same time a bucket was let down containing the last mail for home and friends. This event marked our entrance upon the great ocean.

We all repaired to the dining room and took breakfast and then tried to regain the sleep we had lost the night before. We were called for luncheon at one P. M., and at four P. M. all rushed on deck quickly to see the four or five whales that were spouting and splashing near the boat and the only ones seen during the entire journey, except one near Plymouth, England. We saw a large school of porpoise near the boat the second day and also several times during the journey. These large fish, from three to four feet long, would jump entirely out of the water, coming out of the crest of a high wave and dipping in at the bottom of the trough, thus giving us an excellent view of their apparently happy life.

Our party of ten consists of Prof. M. E. Bogarte, Roy L. Pièrce, Jacob Lowenstine, Jno. L. Brandt, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Bowden, all of Valparaiso, Ind. (the last two were married just before starting, hence we are all on a Bridal Tour and really I erjoy it), J. F. Findley, of Indianapolis, L. E. Brown, of Frankfort, Dr. B F. Slusher, of Decatur, Ill., and your scribe. In all four preachers, bride and groom, one doctor, one professor, one insurance agent and one Jewish merchant—a fine combination, indeed.

Our good ship, the Pennsylvania, of the Hamburg-American Line, is one of the largest and best vessels afloat, and inasmuch as many of your readers will never take an ocean voyage, a few facts concerning this vessel may be interesting.

The Pennsylvania is a twin-screw steamer and was built at Belfast, Ireland, in 1896. She is 585 feet long, and from keel to top of smoke-stack, 110 feet. She has a capacity of 12,256 tons and a passenger capacity of 2,266-301 first-class, 129 second-class and 1,836 deck and steerage; there are 98 state-rooms and 310 births. She draws 32 feet of water and is steered by electricity. She has five boilers, three double ends and two single, with eight steam chests, with a stroke of over four feet. She uses 100 tons of coal per day, or 140 barrels a minute, and this requires twenty-four stokers, eight at a shift, which makes three shifts. The shaft running from the engine to the screw is a solid piece of steel, 260 feet long and 16 inches in diameter. The screws make about 76 revolutions per minute. The Hamburg-American Line owns 75 steamers, of which 22 are screws with a total tonnage of 425,396. We have on board 476 passengers, 78 first-class 63 secondclass, 131 steerage and 204 of the officers and crew. The sailors only receive $15 per month, the 24 firemen only $19, the first mate $50 and the captain $75 and one-half of one per cent. of the value of the cargo. The waiters, stewards, stewardesses, etc., only receive what the passengers give them in tips.

Nearly all the employees of this line are Germans, and when asked why Americans were not employed, Capt. Spleidt, an old tar of twenty-five seasons, answered, "We can get men cheaper anywhere than in America." This shows that American workmen have better labor at more remunerative wages than any other men on the globe.

Our meals on board are excellent. We have a light breakfast at 7:30 A. M., then bouillon served on deck at 10 A. M., lunch at 12:30, consisting of four courses, then bouillon at 3 P. M. on deck, and a fine dinner of six or seven courses at 7 P. M.

About 5 P. M. the first day out, we ran into a dense fog, and immediately the great fog-horn, or rather whistle, began its tremendous blasts, blowing automatically every minute and about ten seconds each time, this was kept up all night and a part of three days, the fog occasionally lifting. We passed one vessel at night, we could hear it blowing its fog alarm far out in the dark and fog from us.

The third day out when we were off Newfoundland we encountered a rough gale and sea. The waves pitched and tossed and foamed, surging against the great ship and throwing spray on deck. One of our party attempted to go downstairs and met his meal coming up.

Another told the story of the little Jew boy who ran to his father in great affright, saying: "Papa! the boat's sinking!" and the parent replied: "Vell, let'er sink; ve don't own 'er!" Two of our party had to run to the rail with "stomach trouble." When one returned I tried to console him by telling him of the fellow under like circumstances, who was asked if the moon was up, and he answered: "Yes it is, if I swallowed it!"

But our poor "bridegroom" had to leave the table hastily, and when he returned (I mean what was left of him did) he was as pale as death. Some one said, "Mr. B. is your stomach weak?" and he gave the old answer, "I don't know—ain't I throwing 'er as far as the rest of 'em?"

During the night the stormy winds abated, and by the middle of the next afternoon the waves were near their normal proportions.

The multitudinous forms of the surging billows, in every imaginable shape and position, rising like mountains, then one hundred peaks breaking, dashing, splashing, foaming; now indigo blue, now most beautiful emerald green, then the dark and purple spots, etc.—space forbids a full description of this than which there is no scene more beautiful.

It has been said that if the ocean were to dry up the course of vessels could be traced by the beer bottles. But while there was much beer and wine consumed on our German boat, there were none drunken, and I heard no swearing or carousing whatever.

We had no religious service the first Sunday. The captain was detained at his post because of the dense fog and could not arrange for the services. But the last Sunday it was my great pleasure at his request to conduct a service which we turned into a C E. or social meeting, in which people of many denominations and several nationalities took part.

At 4 P. M., Monday, Sept. 3rd, we sighted the light-house off Scilly Isle, and only those who have had the experience can appreciate the thrill of joy at the first sight of land. Long before we could see the land the news had been flashed to the entire civilized world of our safe arrival. We touched first at Plymouth, England, at 5 o'clock the next morning, then steamed across the channel to Cherbourg, France, a first-class fortified town and naval prefecture, a city of about 40,000, with a military harbor and a defense of seven fortifications. Here also is a cannon from the fleet of Trouville, which lay for a century and a half at the bottom of the s-a. Here we reluctantly left Capt Spleidt and his good ship and her noble passengers of many vocations. Many of these we had learned to love. We were soon at the wharf, where we passed our first custom-house with fear and trembling (needlessly) and were soon whirling away on a special train for Paris and the Exposition, of which I will write CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

DEAR BRO. TYLER.—A few days ago an elder of he Christian Catholic (?) Church used these words: I know that B. B. Tyler was right when he said, the eldership is an unscriptural affair.'" This, he aid, you stated concerning the eldership in the harch of Christ (Disciples), and from your state nent tried to show that our idea of the eldership is yrong, and tried to show that the idea of the hristian Catholic (?) Church (Dowieites) is right. challenged the interpretation of your words. I hink the quotation was taken from some article on wrote.

Will you kindly tell me in what connection you sed the expression? I suppose that you spoke oncerning the abuse which is found in some concerning the abuse which is found in some concerning.

I cannot consent to be held responsible for the ords, "the eldership is an unscriptural affair." That eldership? I would like to inquire. It is robable that there can be formed an "eldership" hat is "an unscriptural affair." I have no doubt hat the "eldership" of "the Christian Catholic hurch" is such an "affair." It is worth while to pen the New Testament and look into this subject. First of all, we are impressed by the fact that here is so little on the subject of organization in he New Testament. This seems to have been a latter of builttle importance in the minds of the hen who first proclaimed the good news.

In the second place, so far as we have information, Jesus did not command his representatives to rganize churches. He commanded them to preach he gospel. This they did. As a result men turnd to the Lord, and gathered themselves together a congregations. The first place was given to the vargelization of men. This was the important latter. The organization of the converts was a latter of subordinate interest.

Unless one's views on the subject of church rder tend to subvert some fundamental principle f the gospel they are not to be made a reason or refusing cordial Christian fellowship. A nan may be a Congregationalist, a Presbyterian ran Episcopalian on the subject of church order nd organization, and be a brother in Christ in good standing. Any one who loves the Christ and trives to follow him is my brother. He may not hink as I think as to the best ecclesiastical policy—he may even be wrong on that subject—but he smy brother if he believes in and is obedient to esus as Lord. The bond of fellowship is a common devotion to the one Lord and not of agreement in doctrinal or political views. This point is important.

I am impressed also by the fact that there is no account—not even an intimation—of a church organization, on Pentecost, in the city of Jerusalem. The word was preached on that day, and three thousand persons accepted Jesus as Lord. This acceptance they signified by being baptized. This is all there is of Pentecost

The first hint at organization is found in the sixth chapter of the book of Acts. There arose a difficulty in the Jerusalem church about the distribution of alms Toe Grecians murmured against the Hebrews because their willows were neglected in "the daily ministrations." At the suggestion of the apostles seven men "full of the Holy Spirit and of faith" were appointed "over this business." Were the seven men elders? The New Testament does not so affirm. Were they dead ins? They are not so named in the Scripture narrative. As to the name of these functionaries, or officials, the Scriptures are silent. In such a case it is not well for us to be dogmatic.

Elders in the Church of Christ are first mentioned in the eleventh chapter of Acts. The brethren in Antioch sent relief to their suffering friends in Judea—they sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul. It is evident that the elders, in this case, had the general oversight of the believers in Jerusalem and in Judea. When the apostles found that they needed men to assist them in the distributi n of alms they appointed such assistants. It is probable that when they saw that they needed assistants in looking after the spiritual interests of the new converts they appointed men to serve in this capacity. Such persons are called elders in the eleventh of Acts. In this way the "eldership" arose in the Apostolic Church. This office is as enduring as are the spiritual wants of men.

Paul uses the words "elder" and "bishop" interchangeably. An "elder" in his style of speech, is a "bishop" and a "bishop" is an "elder." But the bishops were required "to feed the Church of God." They are, therefore, "pastors." Peter required the elders to "tend the flock of God." Ad dressing the "eldership" of the Ephesian congregation, Paul said, "the Holy Spirit hath made you overseers" in the church. It is expressly said in the New Testament that the elders are to bear rule. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says:

"Remember them that had the rule over you, which spake to you the word of God."

Note the fact that those who bore rule were persons who preached the word. It is evident that the eldership of the church in apostolic times was composed of men who preached the gospel and instructed believers. Paul says that the "elder" MUST "be apt to teach."

The Presbyterian view is that there are two classes of elders, namely, teaching elders and ruling elders. The only text that comes to my mind apparently in favor of this view is the following: "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially those who labour in the word and in teaching" But does this language sustain the Presbyterian view? I think not. It seems to me to mean that when a man is able to so preach the word as to enlist disciples, this is laboring in the word, and then is able to indoctrinate them, that is, labor in teaching, he is worthy of double honor. And why not? Does he not do double work? Such men we have had and now have. The name of the beloved Geo. E. Flower comes to me in this connection. Bro. Flower was one of our most successful evangelists, and as a pastor, in his day, he had few, if any, equals. He was worthy of double honor.

I find no intimation in my study of the New Testament of Diocesan Episcopacy. An elder or bishop was limited in his official functions to the local congregation. He did not rule over a number of churches. His rule was limited to a single congregation of disciples. Diocesan Episcopacy came up at a later period.

So far from one bishop or elder over a number of churches, there were a number of elders in a single congregation. The size of the churches in New Testament times explains the plurality of elders in each. The church in Jerusalem had probably fifteen or twenty thousand members—hence elders plural—in that church. I think that a careful study of the New Testament will satisfy you that a similar reason exists in every case where a plurality of elders is named. Common sense says, where one elder, bishop, pastor, teacher is needed, have one elder, bishop, pastor. Where more than one is needed have more than one, if the material is at hand, and the New Testament says the same thing. As a matter of fact common sense and the New Testament are always in harmony.

You did right to call in question the Dowieite interpretation of my words. I cannot imagine in what connection I used the language quoted by the Dowieite "elder." I am strongly inclined to say that I never in any connection said, "the eldership is an unscriptural affair." I could not have said this without qualification.

While this subject, as I have said, is of subordinate importance, it is at the same time worthy of earnest consideration. May what I have said in this letter stir you up, and others also, to a reexamination of the Scriptur s with a view to discovering certainly what they teach on church order and organization. And do not fear that you will find out that some of us hold unscriptural views. If we hold such views we ought to know it and abandon them. The Lord give us independence and courage.

On Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, the Church of the Disciples on 169th Street held its annual congrega ional meeting, which was most delightful in every particular. Last year it was decided to have a supper for the congregation at 7 o'clock and to have the annual business meeting to follow at eight. It was such a pleasant meeting it was thought best to make this a regular 'eature of the annual meeting in the future. So on the 2nd at 7 o'clock the lecture room was full of beautifully arranged tables, over which the ladies presided with grace and dignity. After a pleasant social hour the meeting went into executive session at which all the various organizations presented written reports. All of these reports were interesting and also encouraging to the whole church. Not only was the social feature a delightful one, but the whole church was enabled by means of the reports to pass in review the whole work of the year and gather up whatever loose threads there might happen to b. Several times we heard the casual remark, "We had no idea that so much had been done in the past year." Suffice it to say all are much encouraged at the prospects, as they are pleased with the record of the past. To our mind one of the most helpful of all the parts of this service was the roll call, to which every member was expected to respond with some appropriate religious sentiment. Many of those compelled to be absent were represented by such a sentiment sent in to be read for them by another. It was a happy meeting, full of sweetest fellowship and peace and withal inspiring. I would commend the holding of a similar meeting in each of our churches annually for if properly managed it will do much good.

Last week many names were selected by the committee on recommendation for the Hall of Fame in the New York University. A point to be noted is the fact that none save American citizens could be chosen for a place of honor. But the committee has memorialized the University Senate asking that another hall adjoining the present one be established for the tablets of famous Americans of foreign birth. No doubt this will be done. Let me suggest that the Disciples of Christ all over the country modestly but strongly present the name of Alexander Campbell for a niche in this temple of fame. No American has done more to enrich the religious thought of our times, or more to correct the abuses of sectarian zealots. No man's influence on the religious tendencies of this age exceeds, or even equals, that of the Sage of Bethany. We who are Disciples of Christ delight to do him honor, and so will all who love the simplicity and power of the gospel when once they realize Mr. Campbell's true place in the religious forces of America. If those who appreciate the greatness of his work would only speak out forcibly in the hearing of this committee, I doubt not that the result would be effective in the further spread of his teachings among men. Will you do it?

Among the most delightful experiences of a great national religious convention is that of its Christian fellowship. Coming over to Kansas City I felt quite lonely on the way, having gotten a late start from New York. But at Jefferson City Bro. J. P. Pinkerton, bishop of the capital city of Missouri, came aboard and on to Kansas City we had a most delightful interview. Among the questions discussed was one chapter of W. E. Garrison's new book, "Alexander Campbell's Theology." I will not say here what we said, but suffice it to say we enjoyed reading and thinking over some of its well-written pages. The New York Letter will have something further about this book after it has been read through. The Kansas City Convention is now in full blast and all in attendance seem happy in the work.

Coming to Kansas City from New York over the Royal Blue Line, the B. & O., the B. & O. S.W., and thence over the Missouri Pacific, one can but be deeply impressed with the immensity and all but limitless resources of this great country. The Lord in his goodness never so favored any people as he has this nation. Will he not therefore require of this people an account correspondingly good? No thoughtful man will say God has given this immeasurable wealth and power into our hands for our good alone. Has he not blessed us that we might be a blessing to others? Is not America chosen of God to become a prophet-nation, so to speak, to all the other nations of the world. Does not all history point plainly to this fact? Hence, let us redeem America; first for America's sake and secondly for the sake of the whole world. It is refreshing and inspiring to a thoughtful mind to go half way across the continent, recalling on the way the historic associations of the cities and sections passed, and di cover, if possible, the great currents of thought and life flowing steadily on under the hand of Providence, to the accomplishment of his will.

One of the most important changes made in the working forces of our missionary operations was the placing of the work of Negro Education and Evangelization in the hands of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. It is thought the women can do more effective service along this particular line than the men. And while the women all may not think so, it is confidently believed by most of them that they will prove this to be, in the end, one of the very best branches of their most excellent service.

* *

Some of the familiar faces at our national gatherings are sadly missed here. Among those most keenly felt by the writer, and doubtless by all, are the faces of Bro. B. B. Tyler and Sister Tyler. The sympathy of the whole convention goes out to them A younger generation of men, strong, noble and true, are rapidly coming into the front ranks to fill the honored places of the great and good men who one by one are passing on to their heavenly rewards.

Texas Letter.

The first Sunday of October was our tenth anniversary as pastor and people in the Central Church of this city, and as is our custom we observed it as such, and spent the morning service in reviewing the work of the year, including also a brief review of the entire ten years, and closing with a glance into the future, and laying plans for the work which we hope to do.

During the year just closing, from Oct., 1899, to Oct., 1900, the figures are briefly as follows: Sermons, 120; additions, 199; marriages, 31; funerals, 31; money for current expenses, $3,333.31; building fund, $1,485.55; missions, $637.75; total $8,141.03. Eleven of our number died during the year. My work in connection with the editorial and business management of the Christian Courler, our state paper, a sixteen-page weekly, added to my pastorate, has forced me to give up pastoral visiting and this work has been turned over to other hands.

The summary for the ten vears of joint labor is: Sermons, 1,365; additions, 1,864; marriages, 247; funerals, 277; money for all purposes, $131,947.-09.

This report represents a good part of one's life—ten years—and it represents much difficult but joyful labor for the Master, and I am s grateful to Him for the honor of such a service It has been poor, I know, but it was the best could do, and as such it has been cast at his fest and his blessings asked upon it.

How swiftly the time flies! It seems more like ten months then ten years since I left the church at S dalia, Mo, and on account of poor health came into the good Southland in the hope of prolonging my life and usefulness, and I thank Good every day that this precious hope has been realized. From the day of my arrival here until this day I have been busy in the Master's business—busier then ever before and my work has been heavier and more difficult, and yet I have constantly improved in health, and to-day weigh almost a half hundred pounds more than when I came, and am doing double the work I did in Missouri. Let God be praised for his marvelous goodness to the children of men!

J. W. Marshall has recently closed a good meeting at Summer's Mill with 21 additions. These brave brethren lost their house in the floods of last spring, but they will build another.

William Johnson's meeting at South Sulphur was short but successful. This is a new point for us. A church of 20 members was organized, and the outlook is good.

F. T. Denson; on account of throat trouble, has had to give up preaching, at least for a while. We regret to know this, and hope that this good and useful preacher may soon be ready for his work again.

A. C. Aten and G. W. Taylor have held a fine meeting at Kingeland with 43 additions. The prospect for a new house there is good.

Tom Smith and E. M. Douthit have been doing some work in Cleburne, one of the most important towns in the state, and every indication is that we will soon have a strong church there Charles Freeman, the pastor, is rejoicing over the prospects.

Don't Know How

TO SELECT FOOD TO REBUILD ON.

"To find that a lack of knowledge of how to properly feed one's self caused me to serve ten long years as a miserable dyspeptic, is rather humiliating. I was a sufferer for that length of time and had become a shadow of my natural self. I was taking medicine all the time and dieting the best I knew how.

"One day I heard of Grape Nuts food, in which the starch was predigested by natural processes and that the food rebuilt the brain and nerve centers. I knew that if my nervous system could be made strong and perfect, I could digest food all right, so I started in on Grape-Nuts, with very little confidence, for I had been disheartened for a long time.

"To my surprise and delight, I found I was improving after living on Grape Nuts a little while, and in three months I had gained 12 pounds and was feeling like a new person. For the past two years I have not had the slightest symptom of indigestion, and am now perfectly well.

"I made a discovery that will be of importance to many mothers. When my infant was two months old, I began to give it softened Grape-Nuts. Baby was being fed on the bottle and not doing well, but after starting on Grape-Nuts food and the water poured over it, the child began to improve rapidly, is now a year old and very fat and healthy and has never been sick. Is unusually bright,—has been saying words ever since it was six months old. I know from experience that there is something in Grape-Nuts that brightess up any one, infant or adult, both physically and mentally."

One hundred and fifty-two delegates assembled at the Harlem Avenue Church, Baltimore, to attend the annual convention of the Disciples of Maryland, Delaware and the District of Columbia. The program of Preachers' Day consisted of an ntroductory sermon by F. D. Power on "Purposes of the Disciples," and addresses as follows: "The Doctrine of the Second Coming of Christ," by Ira W. Kimmel; "The Opportunity of the Church in Social Life," by M. H. H. Lee; "The place of the Disciples of Christ Among the Religious Forces of Co-day," by W. S. Hoye and "Practical Problems Among the Disciples of Christ," by J. A. Hopkins.

The reports of the churches showed an improvement over previous veers. The twenty-three hurches in the co-operation had gained 586 aditions, have a membership of 4,376 and contribted $915 37 for Foreign Missions, $670.78 for Iome Missions, $1,685.45 for State Missions, 511.37 for local missions and $33,085.76 for all urposes. Of the twenty-three churches reportng twenty-one had sent offerings to the Forign and State Boards and sixteen to the Amerian Christian Missionary Society. The Disciples n our district give an average of 86 cents per nember for missions. If the other states had one as well we should not be far from the mark f a million for missions. The Ninth St. Church, Vashington, now leads in membership, having 793 prolled; also reported the largest number of aditions (112) and the largest contributions for all urposes ($6,440). The Vermont Avenue Church ave the largest amount for missions. The H treet Church gives the largest amount per memer and won the Sunday-school prize banner. The Whitney Avenue Church showed the greatest roportionate increase. Thus, the Washington hurches set a good pace and the others followed

J. A. The most important business transacted by the convention was that relating to the establishment of a new seaside resort on the Atlantic Coast. The location near Ocean View, Delaware, was selected by a committee of which F. D. Power was chairman. A company has been formed under the laws of Delaware with capital stock of $50,000 to carry out the project originally proposed by our convention. Bro. J. K. Johler, of Scranton, Pa., is president of the company and R. R. Bulgin, pastor of the Scranton Church, general manager.

These brethren have purchased nearly one thousand acres of land, embracing four miles of water front. The proposition of the company to donate to our convention 10 acres of ground, build an auditorium, etc., in return for our good will in aiding in the sale of lots, was accepted. It is the purpose of the company to build a railroad from Dagsboro, Delaware, to the Beach and to run a steamer on Indian Bay between Rehoboth and the assembly grounds. The first assembly will be held next summer. It is thought that in twenty-five years our people will have a resort as great as that of the Methodist brethren at Ocean

The Boys and Girls' Rally Day.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America impresses me as one of the coming great days of our brotherhood. It seems to me strange that the plan was not sooner wrought out and put into effect. In working without this day we have certainly been without the thing which, above all others, will stir up the minds of our young people on the necessity of earnest work in the home field.

It is axiomatic that the stronger we are at home the more able we are to do work in every way. If we desire to do the work God has given us, it therefore becomes a duty incumbent upon us to make the most of every God-given means to impress upon the mind both of the present and the coming generation the great necessity of more consecrated and zealous effort in the home field. We have done wall, it is true. But we have not done our best. Nothing short of the best should satisfy us.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day fills a long-felt want. It presents just the opportunity needed. In it the children receive first impressions as to the home work. These impressions, carefully nartured, will in the coming days insure a generation of men and women with hearts aflame with zeal for the work in needy American fields. And this is the thing just now desired.

The lack of knowledge is one prolific source of the lack of interest in all missionary enterprises. The more the knowledge, the more intense the zeal. Boys and Girls' Rally Day furnishes the knowledge which produces the zeal. It is the open door on the home work. Shall we go in?

God has intrusted to our care the minds and hearts of the children; what better lessons can they learn than the love for the souls of men and the love of country as taught in the Rally Day exercises? It is to be hoped all our churches will avail themselves of the opportunity offered in the observance of this day to teach the children lessons of liberality; to enable them to make a splendid offering to the home work and at the same time to inculcate the valuable lesson of our duty time to incure solution.

Shall We Criticise Good Men?

It is quite common to excuse the fallacies of men because they are good. Because men are good is no reason that they are right.

Conscientiousness will not save us. A man in Trenton gave the governor poison through mistake. He thought he gave him something that would help him. Because he was conscientious did not excuse him. He was guilty of manslaughter. A traveling man in Montana told a woman when the train stopped to get off, as that was Bozeman, her station. She stepped off into a snow-drift. The train had stopped to clear away the snow. She was found frozen to death. He was conscientious but wrong. Martin Luther and John Calvin were honest and good but wrong. John Wesley was pious, prayerful and good. People refrained from combating him because he was a good man. If Wesley had been refuted where he was wrong, we might have instead of good Methodists, good Christians.

If Mr. Drummond is wrong Brother Haggard is right in setting Drummond on the track. Wrong teaching by a good man is more dangerous than wrong teaching by a bad man. When you pass judgment on the teachings of a man pass that judgment on what he says, not what he is. Morally I am not sure but that Cornelius presented a better manhood than Peter, but Peter had truth on his side and Cornelius must accept it or die a sinner. I have heard people say: "Well, this man's life is superior to that of his critic." Is that any argument? If so, sectarianism is equal to the plea of the Christian Church. They have character but need the truth.

When some of our great men teach unscriptural doctrine, it is not argument to say: "Well, they are spiritual and deserve much respect." Again, when some people want to inculcate some of their wild theories they fall behind the fortification of spirituality. Should some of the false teachings of these good men have been squarely met and boldly exposed without any apology, we would be further along the line of advancement.

"Are these things true?" should be the question. If they do not contain the stamp of truth, they should be hustled out of sight as so much rubbish and cast upon the dumping ground of the past. Mr. Drummond has taught many fallacies, as Dr. Gordon and Gladstone have shown. His goodness should not screen him.

J. V. COOMES.

[The title of the foregoing article raises a false issue. The article to which this criticism refers has nothing in it against criticizing errors in the writings of good men. It was a kindly admonition to do it in a way that would not injure the cause these men loved and served. True, goodness of character does not guarantee infallibility of judgment; but a good man is more apt to be right on matters religious than a man of bad character. But it would be a very great blunder to conclude that we have no right to call in question the theological teaching of men of pure character. This would stop all progress in religious thought. This was not the meaning of the brother to whose article reference is made in the foregoing. Truth demands that error be called in question and refuted wherever it manifests itself. We think the point was well made, however, that we should be cautious not to do injustice to the motives of men whom we criticize.

This being mutually admitted, we desire to call Brother C's attention to a mode of reasoning not uncommon but very misleading, namely, that based on the analogy of natural and moral law. Poison kills just the same whether given intentionally or by mistake. Snow freezes just the same whether one steps into it on purpose or by mistake. What then? Shall we conclude that a man who makes an honest mistake in seeking to do the will of God suffers the same consequence as if he had knowingly violated it? This would be a most illogical and unscriptural conclusion, based on a false analogy between physical and moral law. Every student of moral science understands that the moral quality of an act resides in the intention; hence a man intending to commit murder, but missing his aim, is a murderer nevertheless in the sight of God; but one intending to save life, and causing death, is not a murderer. It is the intention or purpose in each case that governs. This much is true, however, of the analogy: It is a man's business to know physical law and conform to it. It is also the supreme business of every rational being to ascertain what the will of God is concerning him to the best of his ability and conform thereto.

Referring to the expression, "Well, this man's life is superior to that of his critic," Brother C. asks: "Is that any argument?" If true, it would go to show only this much—that the critic would far better be looking after his own character than after his neighbor's theology. It is a serious defect when men attach more importance to orthodoxy, or right thinking, than they do to character. If what our correspondent calls "sectarianism" has superior character to put over against our superior logic and doctrine, we might as well surrender now as later, for character is what tells in the long run. Brother C. does not, perhaps, intend to admit that, but his argument runs dangerously in that direction. Let us beware of assuming that our religious neighbors have all the "sectarianism," and that we have all the "truth." An attitude of greater humility will put us in better condition for receiving the truth that we do not possess. We should be sorry to believe that there are any men among us so hypocritical as to desire to propagate their false teaching under the guise of "spirituality." If there are such, however, we agree with our brother that their false teaching should be "squarely met and boldly exposed." By all means let us tear off the mask of pretended piety from these propagators of "wild theories" and show them to the world in their true colors. It was only concerning confessedly good men that the brother whose article is criticized urged considerate treatment. Hypocrites deserve no such consideration at our hands. They should be mercilessly exposed. -EDITOR.]

Irish Notes and News.

I have just returned, through a gracious providence, from a trip to my native home in Ireland. My brother Matthew, of Union City, Ind., and I traveled together. We went as far as Paris and saw the awful and powerful presentation of the Passion Play at Oberammergau, in Bavaria. While at the old home in Ireland I baptized my dear old father, who has been a strong, staunch, sturdy Presbyterian all his life. The occasion was sacred and joyful beyond what I can express in words. It was a triumph of will and a triumph of the truth as it is in Christ Jesus.

Seven years ago in the same little clear waters of the River Bann, I baptized my sainted mother. A year after she "went home," to be with Christ and many loved ones. My life is made richer and happier and better by this rare and holy experience.

I preached while in England one Sunday at Gloster, where Bro. Edwin Spring is pastor. He is constantly reaping from his labors. The night I preached there were nine persons made the confession. They came to the front as the converts do in America. It was a happy meeting and all the congregation rejoiced. I do not think we have a better church in England than the one at Gloster.

Matthew preached on the same Sunday for Bro. E. M. Todd, of the West London Tabernacle. He reported good meetings and a splendid time. It was delightful to meet again in their home, Sister M. D. Todd and Earl and Flora. Miss Flora has grown to be a young lady now and all are in splendid health and spirits. I had a very pleasant visit with Bros. Paul Moore and Durban in the Commonwealth office. They showed us all kindness and gave us a hearty welcome. The Commonwealth office, including editors and hands, is, I think, the busiest place I saw in my trip. The front page of the paper is suggestive. There is the picture of the rising oun, chasing away the shadows and shining upon an open Bible, with the words "Let there be light." Also "For the advocacy of good and right and truth." A scriptural quotation is added which reads: "He wrought good and right and truth before the Lord . . . with all his heart and prospered."

I had a pleasant visit with some of our brethren in our Liverpool Church. Bro. Bicknell, the pastor, is in love with the work and workers and the brethren are all in love with him. Liverpool never was, perhaps, in as prosperous a condition as it is now. Gloster, London and Liverpool congregations remember Brother Willet and his wirk. Bro. Romig accomplished a good work in England. He showed, as no one else did, that England has vast possibilities for evargelistic work as we carry it on in America. The English are a sincere, sturdy, hearty race of people and know a good thing when they see it, if they don't rush for it as fast as Americans.

The work in Bedford is pl-asant and prosperous. Bro. Z. T. Sweeney laid the corner stone of our new $25,000 stone church which will be enclosed in about two months, a few days ago, and he and his brother John filled the pulp t in my absence. Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

Showed the Minister

AND GOT HIM IN LINE.

"In a minister's family in Los Angeles where I was visiting some time ago, the wife complained of serious indigestion and dyspepsia. She admitted that she used coffee and said she more than half believed that was the trouble. I told her that I knew it was the trouble, for I had gone through with the experience myself and had only been cured when I left off coffee and took up Postum Food Coffee.

"She said she had tried the Postum, both for herself and her husband, but they did not like it. With her permission, I made Postum next morning myself, and boiled it full fifteen minutes after the real boiling of the pot began. Then when it was served, it was a rich, deep brown color and had the true flavor and food value that every Postum maker knows. It is all folly to talk about trying to make Postum with one or two minutes' steep ing.

"You can't get something good for nothing. It must be boiled, boiled, boiled, and to keep it from boiling over, use small lump of butter, perhaps twice the size of a pea. That morning the minister and his wife liked Postum so well that their whole lives were changed on the question of diet, and they abandoned coffee at once and for all time.

"Now after a hard day's work, they are comforted, refreshed, and rested by a cup of well-made Postum for supper. They are both enthusiastic in its praise. The wife has entirely recovered from her dyspepsia. I will not go into the details of my own case, except to say that I was a desperate sufferer with dyspepsia and discovered by leaving off coffee that coffee was the cause of it. I quickly got well when I took up Postum Food Coffee. I earnestly hope many more coffee drinkers may get their eyes open." Name and address given by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Galveston Letter.

On behalf of the stricken church, I thank the od brethren for what they have done, and for at they shall yet do for us. Among all the eat, grand and sweet things said and done at e great Kansas City Convention, I am persuaded at the tenderest of them all was this sacred nistry to the bereaved and the destitute, the lping hand extended the sister church that could t of herself rise again. It was unspeakably autiful, brethren and sisters,-that wonderful mmunion at the Armory, the offering for Galston, the prayer, the tears, the solicitude for r welfare, the kind inquiries after dear wife and bles, the love, the encouragement throughout of it. The beloved Paul is yet moving among churches to gather sustenance for the poor nts in Jerusalem. Many churches will very on send offerings for Galveston. Galveston will ow as never before. It is hoped the amount reved will enable us to place this good work of American Christian Missionary Society on a re progressive footing than ever.

A good tent has been donated, to enable us to be advantage of the opportunity for evangeling the workmen strangers in the city, while ring for our poor. Other gifts of supplies have en made; these will be reported later.

Just a word to Ladies' Aid Societies and others o desire to send supplies. If possible to you, ad bedding and house linen. This is the greatneed at present, although clothing can be ed. Send to me, freight prepaid.

Many unacknowledged communications must be swered later. JESSE B. HASTON.

he Passion Play—and Theatricals in General.

The brother who in last week's CHRISTIAN-ANGELIST seeks to furnish some "facts about Itics" upon the Passion Play is not personal in at he has to say; and this is well, for controrsy between brethren is unseemly, and the lumns of our best papers seem haply to be growing bre and more free from that. Our brother wisely ncedes that there is the "Christian critic," alough others may be found so inconsistent as to cry the Passion Play, while having "no trouble out attending theatres" in general. When he fers to "the thousands of Americans that have tended the play," he will doubtless concede also at there are tens of thousands of Christians who buld not attend the Passion Play on the Lord's y or on any other day (quite apart from its-to me-seeming sacrilegiousness), for the reason at they believe such attendance to be plainly on e side of helping to make theatre-goers ssibly among church members even, taking the ore or less frequent and the occasional attenints upon the theatre, they outnumber the total stainers from theatre going; but there are very any who are persuaded that the theatre is past forming and that church members should it entirely loose from this worldly indulgence. the church does not set up and maintain such a andard it will never be done. As an instance whas a matter-of-course pastime theatre-going in the world at large, I cite the following case: y twelve year-old boy-who has never attended ie theatre—came home from school a few days 30 saying that his teacher had proposed to the holars of their room that they all attend the ay of Rip Van Winkle, to be given by Joseph efferson and his company in one of the popular leatres-a theatre, by the way, that frequently ives performances on Sunday. This proposition teacher made without any slightest hint that me of the parents might not be agreeable to neir children's, going to the theatre. It is the

The West Side Church of Christ, Chicago.

The West Side Church of Christ was organized in October, 1873, under the name "Central Christian Church."

The first pastor of the church was Geo. C. Mullins, afterward chaplain in the U.S. Army and now residing in Los Angeles, Cal. After him the following preachers in the order named have served the congregation: A. J. White, A. J. Laughlin, J. H. Wright, B. W. Johnson, F. M. Kirkham, J. W. Allen, J. H. O. Smith, Bruce Brown. Like Israel in the wilderness the congregation has led a wandering life. Since the organization of the church the congregation has met in seven different localities. It has been literally a bat le, a long, hard battle for life. To fight this battle through to victory has required faith and hope and courage in no common decree. Often to go forward seemed like leading a forlorn hope. But this brave little band of Disciples never faltered but moved steadily on in the face of all difficulties and discouragements.

Ground was broken for the present building in the spring of '92 and in November following the congregation began to hold its meetings in the lecture room of the building. Sunday, Nov. 4, its wanderings over, the congregation meets for the first time in its auditorium.

The church property, house and lot, has cost in the neighborhood of $40,000. The building is of brick with heavy stone trimmings. The lecture-room has a seating capacity of 800. The auditorium, with gallery extending around the entire room, has about 1,200 sittings.

The present membership is 550, well organized in all departments of Christian work with a flourishing Sunday-school, excellent Christian Endeavor Societies, Senior and Intermediate, King's Daughters, Ludies' Aid, C. W. B. M. Auxiliary and Bible Study Guild.

The church building is admirably located in one of the best residence districts of the West Side and the congregation, united and harmonious, has a bright future before it along all lines of aggressive Christian work. The dedicatory services take place Sunday, Nov. 4, with Z. T. Sweeney as chief speaker. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon a union communion service of all our Chicago churches will be held, Dr. H. L. Willett delivering the address.

We extend a hearty invitation to all our friends and brethren in the city and out of it to be with us in these meetings.

The church will entertain all visitors who desire to remain over from ore service to another.

Great interest always attaches to the safe arrival into port of a vessel that comes in from a stormy sea.

Virginia News Notes.

R. W. Lilly has just entered upon his second year with his group of churches in Craig Co. He has seven points to meet and will be kept very busy. He held a meeting recently for the Bluefield church with several additions, and one on Pott's Creek with 20 accessions. The work prospers in his hands.

C. E. Elmore has been called to the work in the Southeastern as my successor. Hope he will accept.

W. H. Book is beginning to stir things in the South Piedmont. Had more than 50 additions during his recent meeting at Martinsville where he is pastor.

J. H. Gillespie has been called for his third year to the church at Pembroke and its attending group. Jim is one of our strong preachers. He knows the Book, believes it and preaches it with force.

Our state convention comes off Nov. 13-16 at Richmond, Va. Let all attend who can and enjoy the good things that there are in store for us. Let us make this the best convention in the history of our work in Virglnia.

The Southeastern District is planning to put an evangelist in the field. This is the ripest field in the whole state. Hope the state and district boards will co-operate in this work.

The state has lest one of her best preachers in W. S. Bullard. He goes to Texarkana, Tex.

Tazewell College is on a b om this year. New buildings are badly needed to accommodate the students. The Virginia brotherhood needs a good college and Tazewell is the place for it. They have a first class faculty this year and we look for good results.

Lincoln (Neb.) Letter.

On Oct. 7th the First Christian Church of this city held a special service of rejoicing. The pastor announced that the mountain of indebtedness which had so long impeded the progress of the congregation, had been "removed and cast into the sea." Releases were exhibited, showing that judgments aggregating about $5,000 have been settled. Last March this congregation was successful in a suit involving $13,000; and now concessions have been made and sufficient money raised to clear away the remaining debts. The church will either buy or build a suitable home in the near future. There have been 89 additions since Jan. 1, 1899. The present pastor has been called again for an indefinite period. Our present membership is over 350. Hope fills all our hearts. Rejoice with us.

A High Day for Tower Hill.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:-Yesterday was a high day for the Church of Christ in Tower Hill, Ill. It was the day upon which they dedicated their new house of worship, and the other churches in the place omitted their usual services in order to meet and rejoice with them. From town and country they gathered in until the house could hold no more and the people lingered about the doors and windows.

The house is a beautiful and comfortable one, prettily furnished and equipped. The report of the building committee showed that there were needed $250 to meet all obligations. At the close of the morning service this amount was raised, and the congregation starts out with bright prospects and high hopes, under the pastorate of Bro. J. O. Henry. For the elegant new house the chief credit is due to Bro. John T. Killam, whose zeal and activity knew no intermission, and whose liberality was manifest. B. J. RADFORD.

"Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America."

The Day. The Chattanooga Convention decided that the Lord's day before Thanksgiving Day in November is Boys and Girls' Relly Day for

The Offering. The convention ordered that the offerings of the schools be divided as follows: "One-fifth to the Board of Church Extension, twofifths to the State Board of Missions of the state from whence it comes, and twe-fifths to the Acting Board of the American Christian Missionary Society; all money to be sent to Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, where the division will be made.

The Purpose. The purpose of this day is to educate our young people in Home Missions, both State and General, and to secure their help in the great work of winning America to Christ.

The Exercise. A splendid Concert Exercise has been prepared by C. M. Fillmore, with music by J. H. Fillmore and C. M. Fillmore, and it will be sent free to all schools who will ask for it We expect large orders for this exercise. Write Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O., for the number you will need.

How Observe the Day. Begin now to plan for it; make it the most enthusiastic day of the year. Let it be a harvest home festival. Let it be Thanksgiving Day. Let it be Rally Day for the winter campaign. Let it be a day for God and home and native land.

How Decorate the School Room. The American ag should be freely used, and the autumn fruits, , lants and flowers.

Mottoes for the Church Walls. "America for Christ," "For God and Home and Native Land," "As goes America, so goes the World," "America is the Basis of Supplies," "Three Hundred Dollars will Support a Home Missionary a Whole Year," "Five Dollars will Bring a Soul to Christ in the Home Mission Field," "This Offering is for State and General Home Missions," "Let us Help Win (insert name of state) to Christ," "Our State Board Supports - Missionaries, Our Sunday-Schools can Easily Double the Number," "Let us Make and Keep Home Missions and Foreign Missions Equal in our Love, our Prayers and our Offerings," "America is the Ripest Mission Field in the World."

To Whom the Money Should be Sent. To Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O., where it will be divided and forwarded according to the action of the Chattanooga Convention.

The Army Canteens.

DITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: -The canteens sing our soldiers are something that ought to done away with. It is very little the siliers derive from that branch, and besides it courages them to do a great many things they wild not do otherwise If the advocates of the cteen could be among the soldiers and see for t mselves what happens every day, they would y readily see the uselessness and the evil infince of the army canteen. It encourages the gliers to spend their money long before they it, and teaches them the very principle of one. I have often seen the soldiers on pay day nothing but a lot of canteen vouchers for fir pay. Why? Because during the month y were induced to draw the vouchers. They ald not go to town and thereby are persuaded to to the canteen. On each pay day they are aged to pay to the canteen the amount. They "they will only let a soldier draw one-fifth of pay during the month in canteen vouchers," that is untrue, for they will issue all they , for it is more money in the casteen funds, just where the canteen funds go to the soldier er knows. If the soldier goes to the canteen buy anything he has to pay blg prices, while an cer gets it for just what it costs the canteen. seems to the soldiers that if any one should get goods at just what it costs it should be themives, because the officers' pay is from ten to enty times that of a private.

The records of the canteen law in the past does show any good, and I cannot see why they i't repeal the law or make an amendment that uld improve it, for as long as it is continued as s now it will be the cause of many unnecessary believe if it were left to the soldiers they ald soon do away with all the canteens in exence to-day. Of course, there are quite a numthe boys in the army that don't realize and n't yet know the evils that exist in the canteens, t in years to come these will be able to see elr evil effects.

I see that there are a great many Christians coughout the United States fighting the canteen w, and I hope in time to come it will be a thing the past. Sincerely yours.

Zachary-Carlin Debate.

The Zachary-Carlin six days' debate at Drake eek, Ark., on the "Origin, Doctrine and Prace of Christian and Baptist Churches," closed toher 13th, with several hundred people in at-

There was much interest in the discussiom from e b ginning to the close, and it is believed great od was done for the cause of truth.

Brother Zachary is from Lexington, Ky., and aducted his part of the debate in an able and ntlemanly war and won the esteem of all rightinking and fair-minded people.

Prof. Allie Duncan was his moderator and Dug arper, a Baptist preacher, moderator for Carlin. 18 president moderator was changed two or three mes dur ng the debate.

In the process of the discussion, Brother chary showed that John's baptism was not aristian baptism, because, (1) it was not precedby faith in a crucified, buried, risen and exalted wior; (2) it was not or lained by Christ, was, erefore, no more Christian than the Jewish feast unleavened bread; (3) it was not administer I with the Christian ceremony: "Into the name of e Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," id (4) because Jesus afterwards instituted the baptism rightly called Christian. Matt. 28:18-20; Acts 19:1-5. Under the force of these arguments Carlin got mad and raised a chair before a large audience to strike Bro. Zachary. This created a momentary excitement, but was soon quelled by cool heads, and the debate moved on smoothly. Bro. Zachary told Carlin that his chair business was the physical, heartfelt religion working out of him, and since Carlin could not defend his religion with the word of God, he resorted to the use of a chair. Carlin's conduct materially injured the Baptist cause. He is a most vituperative and unscrupulous debater, dealing chiefly in abuse and misrepresentation. Such a man will always injure the Baptist cause and kill his own influence in debate with a considerate and careful preacher like Bro. Zachary.

The church at Drake Creek gave Bro. Zachary $50 and bade him God-speed in his able defense of the truth. Four years ago he met A. H. Antry, a missionary Baptist, in debate in this county and as a result there have been many conversions to the LUCILE POWELL.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is t safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier nature, but few realize its value when taken in the human system for the same cleansing purpos

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absor the gases and impurities always present in the stor ach and intestines and carries them out of the sy tem.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking drinking or after eating onions and odorous veget bles.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the co plexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in t stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth a throat from the poison of catarrh result from their continued use, but on the contre great benefit.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or anothe but probably the best charcoal and the most for t money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they a composed of the finest powdered Willow charce and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting loze ges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lenges to all patients suffering from gas in the sto ach and bowels, and to clear the c mplexion a purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also belie the liver is greatly benefited by the dally use them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at d stores, and although in some sense a patent pre-ration yet I believe I get more and better charc in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of a ordidary charcoal tablets."

The Holy and Common.

C. H. WETHERBE.

It is asserted by some leaders of Christian ought that there ought to be no particular stinction made between what are called cred and secular things. They affirm at, properly speaking, all things should be garded as being sacred in the estimation Christians. At one time I was somewhat clined to accept this view, but now I am rsuaded that a real distinction should be ade between holy things and common

It is quite evident that God makes this stinction. We see it maintained throughit the Bible. The idea of consecration perdes the Bible, which means that common id secular possessions are to be set apart id consecrated to the Lord and to holy es. Things which are intrinsically unholy ay be made holy by their conversion to oly purposes. The secular may become cred by its specific devotion to divine rvice and exclusively religious dispensaon. It has been said that the division of ings into sacred and secular classes was le work of certain pietists in olden times; hile it may be true that prominent emphas was placed on such division and distincon by a certain order of religionists, yet ich a thing has nothing to do with what he Bible says about the question.

I have just been reading the following assage in Ezek. 44:23, R. V.: "They shall each my people the difference between the oly and the common and cause them to disern between the unclean and the clean." nd this difference was divinely maintained ll through the times which are covered by he writings of the Bible. Many things which were in themselves good, were rearded as being unholy because they were ot dedicated to the Lord. They were not et apart to God's specific service. Some ien were called, in a peculiar sense, "holy men," not that they were any better than some other men, but because they were consecrated to some specially holy service for God, as in the case of the prophets. In Peter's second epistle the term "holy prophets" is used. There is no reason to think that those prophets were more specifically or essentially holy than some of their brethren who were not prophets.

The difference consisted in the fact that the prophets were set apart for the special work of prophesying for the Lord, while others were not. There is, then, a reason for speaking of some persons and things as being holy and of other persons and things as being common or secular.

What is needed is a much more extended conversion of secular things to sacred uses. We are secularizing many things which ought to be made holy.

A Good Story.

The late Dr. M. D. Hoge, of Richmond, Va., tells of two Christian men who "fell out." One heard that the other was talking against him, and he went to him, and said:

"Will you be kind enough to tell my faults to my face, that I may profit by your Christian candor, and try to get rid of them?"

"Yes, sir," replied the other, "I will do it." They went aside, and the former said:

"Before you commence telling what you think wrong in me, will you please bow down with me, and let us pray over it, that my eyes may be opened to see my faults as you will tell them? You lead in the prayer."

It was done, and when the prayer was over, the man who had sought the interview said:

"Now proceed with what you have to complain of in me."

But the other replied: "After praying over it, it looks so little that it is not worth while talking about. The truth is, I feel now that in going around talking against you, I have been serving the devil myself, and I have need that you pray for me and forgive me the wrong I have done you."

Doctor Hoge tells the story very well, and here and there in almost every community is a man or woman who might profit by it.-Religious Herald.

Practical Sermons from Revised Texts.

BY REV. PRACTICAL CHRISTIAN.

Subject: Greatness.

TEXT: "He that would be greatest among you shall make servants of the rest" Mk. 10:43

Great men are those who can command service. The truly great man has not only a number of servants about his house, but has dozens or hundreds of servants working in his factory or business earning money for him. That is the way to get.

When we study the Bible carefully we find perfect harmony in all of Jesus' teaching. Note the following: "It is more blessed to get than to give." "Lay up for your selves treasures on the earth." "He that would be greatest among you shall make servants of the rest." By obeying all of his commands we will grow rich and have an easy time here and get an upholstered seat in heaven.

At the last supper when Jesus wanted his feet washed he commanded Peter to get a basin and towel and wash them. And after it was done he said: "If I, then, your Lord and Master, have commanded you to wash my feet, ye ought also to be able to have other people wash your feet, for I have given you an example." Thus the Lord illustrates his teachings by his life.

Let us all cultivate greatness and get as high up in the world and as near heaven as possible.

When Pride is Sinful.

When is pride sinful? When it becomes the excess of the underlying virtue. Wrongful pride is the undue exaltation of self. It is regarding one's self from a mistaken point of view in reference to one's ability, characteristics or disposition. It is centering thought upon self to the exclusion of others, their interests and the obligation which one sustains to them more than is consistent with duty to them. In other words, it is selfish, and whatever is selfish is so far sinful. The false notions which thus are begotten about ourselves lead to false adjustments of our lives to the lives of others. - Congregationalist.

Beyond.

BY G. S. JUDD.

What will I do when life's deep shadows lengthen, And night her sable curtain drops around? When cords that bind me to the unseen strengthen And draw me to that silent solitude profound?

What knowledge have I of the land immortal,
Where spirits wander freed from forms of clay?
What path leads outward from the narrow portal,
Through which I enter when I'm called away?

Can I look upward when the stars shine o'er us, When these dim eyes are in the valley laid? And can I hear the spheres sing in their chorus When I am sleeping in the willow's shade?

With sight, and touch, all sense denied me,
A: d all my guides to human conduct gone,
How will my former strength and aids deride me,
How like a helpless infant left alone!

Are there no footprints in the ambient ether,
That I may follow as I onward roam,
Is there no guide to lead me whither
I may find rest, and friends, and home?

Is there no passport, charm or token, No watchword, shibboleth or sign, Wh·n all connection with this life is broken, Wi'l give me entrance to a home divine?

When age enfeebles, weariness oppresses,
When cheer and friends, ambition, all are gone,
When like a tired child I long for love's caresses,
Have I no hope, no trust, to lean upon?

Ah yes! there is a hope, a trust immortal,
That when my hour of solitude shall come,
I shall find conduct safely through death's portal
To rest and friends, to sinlessness and home.

For God, who called me into conscious being By incarnation of his love for me, Bids me nor doubt, but trust to his clear seeing For all the good which I have failed to see.

So, as the birds, when evening twilight falleth, Twitter and call, and trustful sink to rest, I will respond and trust to him who calleth, "And sleep and wake and evermore be blest. Everett, Wash., October, 1900.

Raising Children.

Parents should be firm but gentle with their children. The worst mi take possible is to lose your temper in dealing with them. Never correct them by whipping when your anger is aroused, else you may regret it. If you must punish your child, wait until you have calmly considered the matter, and then do not give him any more than you think the occasion merits. Having punished him, do not pet him afterward unless you want to have a second ordeal follow quickly on the heels of the first. Let him know that you love him, that it pains you to have to correct him and that you hope never to have ' it to do again; but do not let him think that he is the injured party.

A great many parents make the mistake of not being companionable to their children. Don't you know that your child is going to have a confidant of some sort? Wouldn't you prefer to have him confide in you, thus enabling you to give proper direction to his life? If you are cold and distant and do not take time from your business or home affairs to make of your child a bosom friend, is he likely to unburden all of his little sorrows and joys, hopes and fears, to you? He will not think it worth the while, and you will be exceedingly fortunate if he does not begin to deceive you early in life. Show me a father who is a boy with his boys, or a mother who is a girl with ber girls, and I'll promise to point out to you in later years a household not marred by any of the vices which destroy so many happy homes in these busy times.-The Sunny South.

The Secret of Beautiful Rooms.

A window with a large sheet of plate glass gives from its great space the effect of perpetual openness and out of-doors coolness. A soft divided curtain to be drawn across the sash from either side can moderate this effect when it becomes oppressive. A large unbroken sheet of glass interrupts the decorative scheme of the room and breaks the rhythm. For inexpensive curtains in a sitting room, library or dining room, the Calcutta lattice net is the most artistic and inexpensive material offered. In all tones of color from cream white and ecru to golden orange and forest green, the melting shades harmonize with any scheme of decoration. They cost from fifty to seventy-five cents a yard according to the finish, either with fringe or selvage. In a bedroom there is nothing which equals in fitness the white muslin sash curtain with the pretty chintz or printed India cotton within hanging full and straight at either side. Good Housekeeping for October.

How Long is Eternity?

It is impossible for the human mind to conceive of an adequate measurement for eternity, or for infinite space. We refer to this when we desire to express anything that cannot be measured. Elihu Burritt says, "To attempt to measure the influence of Sunday-schools would be like applying a two-foot rule to infinite space, or the measurement of a moment to eternity." This is the opinion of one great man concerning this great agency for good-the Sundayschool. We presume the comparison is just. There are many thousands and millions in our own country who agree with Mr. Burritt. The International Sunday-school Convention is setting itself to this problem and is laboring night and day to advance the Sunday-school interests of this country, because the Sunday-school is the hope of the nation. Mr. Marion Lawrance, General Secretary of the International Convention, residing at Toledo, O., will send circulars to any desiring them, explaining this great movement.

Living in the Past.

It is never wise to live in the past. There are, indeed, some uses of our past which are helpful, and which bring blessing. We should remember our past lost condition to keep us humble and faithful. We should remember past mercies, that we may have confidence in new needs or trials in the future. We should remember past comforts, that there may be stars in our sky wh night comes again. But while there at these true uses of memory, we should gua against living in the past. We should draw our life inspirations not from memory, be from hope; not from what is gone, bu from what is yet to come. Forgetting the thin which are behind, we should reach forward unto those things which are before.—J. Miller.

Where Doctor Hoyt Could Hav Stopped.

Dr. Thomas A. Hoyt, the pastor of the Chambers-Wylie Memorial Church, of the adelphia, was recently entertaining the dent Patton, of Princeton, General John Gordon, and other eminent men, at dinner the guests were speaking in strong praisof a sermon the minister had just preached and those who were versed in theology we discussing the doctrinal points he had brought out.

Doctor Hoyt's young son was sitting the table, and President Patton, turning him, said:

"My boy, what did you think of yo father's sermon? I saw you listening i tently to it;" at which praise Mrs. Ho smiled cordially, and all listened to be what sort of a reply the lad would make.

"I guess it was very good," said the be but there were three mighty fine plac where he could have stopped."—Saturd Evening Post.

A Cowboy's Religion.

A converted cowboy once gave this ve sensible idea of what religion is: "Lots folks that would really like to do rig think that servin' the Lord means shout themselves hoarse praisin' his name. No I'll tell you how I look at that. I'm work here for Jim. Now, if I'd sit around t house here, tellin' what a good fellow J is, and singin' songs to him, and gettin' in the night to serenade him, I'd be do just what lots of Christians do; but wouldn't suit Jim, and I'd get fired might quick. But when I buckle on my straps a hustle among the hills and see that Jir herd is all right, and not sufferin' for wat and feed, or bein' off the range and brand by cattle thieves, then I'm servin' Jim as wants to be served."-Selected.

W. H. B.

O burdened hearts, cease thy repining, Above the clouds the sun is shining. What if the world is clothed in night; The stars above are shining bright. What though his base the mists enfold, The mountain's crest is bothed in gold. The Happy Home.

Grinding poverty is a lingering calamity, nd over-wealth, though in a different way, not much better. The happiness of the vorld is stored away, as it is in heaven, where moth and rust can not corrupt nor hieves break through and steal. It is not n the hovels, amid vermin and corruption, or in the stately mansions, which are packdfull of rivalries, anxieties and vexations -it is in those homes which the industry of oth the husband and the wife is required o maintain. There dwells the real happiess of love and duty-the husband workng cheerfully for the highest reward a man an have-his wife and children; and the rife putting love into her busy industry for im and them. The husband can find neithr work nor amusement more agreeable han his help to bear off from the wife such f the heavy work of the home as he can, to ook after the tidiness and healthfulness of he dwelling and its grounds, and to give leasant little surprises such as his ingenuty can suggest to both wife and children. he wife is at the happiest when skillfully toring away her jellies and jams and appeizers, when planning this little frock and xclaiming in mock petulance at the dirt nd dilapidation of the little knee-breeches nd stockings. That is the fact—it is no ttempt to reconcile people to their lot-it s the fact that these are the conditions of he highest human happiness. Below, in qualor, poverty, and the cause of them, vhich is nearly always some moral defect, here is no place for happiness. Above, in ffluence, amid many servants and the comnand of the caterers, there is no opportunity or occasion for the pleasantest of all activities. One passion alone can be gratiied-pride-all the rest soon becomes a wearisome monotony. Every person of wealth who reads this paragraph will sigh, 'That is perfectly true—it is a horrible monotony." Pride is eclipsed and wounded every day in the year. The gay bird is stoned from below and hawked at from above. Most of us men and women who have to work may take pleasure in growl ing at it. The fact is that, in our hearts, we are proud of it, and take to ourselves a sense of merit because of it, and would find deprivation of it to be the greatest calamity. The wife who is conscious that she has done what she could to make the home-coming pleasant, and the husband who is conscious that he has done his best to make the home comfortable and respectable, will meet at the evening table in possession of all the conditions of happiness that are possible to man.—The Interior.

Stay on the Farm.

A recent writer urges boys to go on the farm. He prophesies that the farm will soon return to favor, as it will to greater profit. He suggests that the life of the farmer is far more peaceful and independent than the lot of the average city man. Conditions are annually growing more uncertain and difficult in the cities. Then, too, a dollar earned at home is worth two earned abroad. The writer refers to Lancaster County, Pa., showing the money made and saved by the farming community. There are in the county thirty-seven thousand men, and there are twenty-two million dollars out at interest in tne county, hundreds of millions in homes, besides one horse to every male adult, and household comforts galore.—American Boy.

The Curse of the Saloon.

The diabolical business of making drunkards of children is the pastime of the American liquor dealer, except where the sword of the law is lifted above his head by the strong arm of the law and order societies. . . What is it that breaks down our Sabbaths and our Sunday laws, and gives over our great cities to the domination of the depraved and criminal classes? liquor interest. What is it that leads so many thousands of our young men who ought to be pillars in the church into lives of dissipation? The evil passions of their hearts, supplemented by the thousands of miles of open saloons in our cities, and aided by the example of good people who assert their rights and liberties at the expense of others. What is it that hurts the spiritual life of so many? In part, the drink habit. What is it that weakens the force of the church in its testimony against the chief enemy of Christ in the world? The fact that we are not wholly free from alliance with that enemy. What is it that is beating the Decalogue into fragments? The drink habit allies itself with every vice; it dethrones God from the heart; it dishonors father and mother; it desecrates the weekly rest day; it is the ally of licentiousness; it is a great support to that covetousness which is idolatry. - John Henry Barrows in the Pittsburg Christian Advocate

IV .- Linda May Hides Her Dog.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

When you have a dog, you must feed him. It's the same way with birds in cages. That's the trouble. It was out of the question to expect to get any of the breakfast scraps to the dog hidden in the storm-cellar. Linda May knew that Miss Dollie made a mental inventory of every scrap just as soon as it became a scrap. Not that the old lady was the least stingy, but she hated waste to such a degree that she would eat more than she wanted rather than see anything thrown away. Of course her chickens would eat 'most anything, but they drew the line at pickles. While Linda May was eating her breakfast, she kept wondering how she could get provisions to Lucifer. That was what she had decided to call the dog. She had seen the name some where, and she thought it sounded pleasant. Of course she had no idea that Lucifer was just another name for the devil; had she known this, she would have called the dog something else. She asked for a biscuit, and in a few seconds she reached over and took another. Aunt Dollie stared at Linda May's plate to see what she was doing with the first. The first was nowhere to be seen. In fact, it was in Linda May's lap, under her apron; but Aunt Dollie supposed it had got inside of Linda May by some fearful cramming process. "Linda May!" she cried, "drink quick!"

"What for?" said Linda May, turning very red. Miss Dollie supposed she was suffocating and ran around and gave her a few slaps on the back to help the biscuit down to its supposed destination. She hit harder than she intended, in her excitement, and that made Linda May lose her breath, sure enough, and that made Miss Dollie pat her harder than ever. When the aunt took her seat, she kept her eyes fastened upon the child, while she told her how wrong and unladylike it was to gulp down her food in such extraordinary haste. "I don't see how you did it," she kept repeating. Linda May felt guilty and miserable, but she had to feed Lucifer. So she slipped down in the stormcellar, just before starting for school. She gave him the biscuit, which he caught in the middle with his front teeth, and which he threw down his mouth with one gulp. Then he looked at Linda May with all his might and showed as plain as plain could be that he didn't consider what he had had as even a beginning. He had a way of looking out of his great brown eyes that said: "Of course I know you are a nice girl, used to good society, and you wouldn't insult me by trying to feed me on a crumb. I see you have a basket with you, and I smell ham in it, and I expect you to place it upon the ground at my feet." After that Linda May could do nothing but give Lucifer the dinner she had intended to enjoy at noon. So she went to school with nothing but her books, her fresh handkerchief and her ten cents' worth of lemon drops.

At the morning recess, she and Madge and Pete and Letitia came together in the vard as by a common impulse. Linda May told her adventures. Madge and Pete said they had found lemon drops in their box. So had Letitia in hers! They had brought them to school. They compared them, but they found they were all just alike. What a funny tramp to put candy in all their boxes!

"Did he sleep in your barn, last night?" asked Linda May.

"I didn't ask him," said Pete. That meant that she didn't want to discuss the tramp. Linda May felt that Nap was Pete's tramp, so she did not press the point. "I tell you what I want," she said, "I want you and Madge to take Lucifer and keep him, and then I can come to your house and play with him." None of them knew what Lucifer meant, so they thought it a fine name.

"We have cats," said Madge, "I don't know if mamma will take dogs, too. But I'll ask her and you come home with me after school and find out."

"I will have to go home," said Linda May,
"I know Aunt Dollie won't let me go to your house two days hand running. You come to see me."

"Oh," said Madge, "you can't do anything at your house."

"No," said Pete, "there's no fun there."

"I will be there," said Linda May, timidly.
"Girls," said Letitia, "you are very impolite, I think. Linda May, I will come to see you, if mamma will let me."

"Well," said Pete, arguing the point, "is there a barn at Linda May's? Is there a swing? Can you sit on the grass? Can you sit out on the front porch? Can you eat between meals?"

"There is a hill over the storm-cellar," said Madge, "can you roll on that hill?"

"I know all that," said Linda May, quite humbly, "I understand what you mean. But Aunt Dollie won't let me go to your house until you visit me."

"Well, I'll come around and tell you if we can keep Lucifer," said Madge, "and I guess it will be some fun slipping him away, anyhow."

Just as soon as school let out Linda May ran home, eager to see Lucifer. But as she entered the yard a lady drove up and stopped. She got out and so did her little girl. They had come to visit Miss Dollie and Linda May had to go in the parlor and talk to the little girl. The little girl was one of that kind who won't talk, or smile, or play, until they have been with you about an hour, and then they thaw out and want to bang on the piano all the time because they haven't one at home. Linda May knew what she wanted, so she tried to get her to go to the piano right away; but the girl just shook her head; she hadn't been there long enough.

Miss Dollie looked out of the window and cried, "Oh, you've brought your dog with you!"

"Did he come?" asked the lady in gre surprise, "La, I told him to stay at home "And he's scratching," cried Miss Dollie, great excitement, "Come quick! He scratching a hole right in my blue-grass!"

"He's likely after a mink" said the let

"He's likely after a mink," said the lad who didn't seem much interested.

"There is not a mink on my premises said Miss Dollie. "Come, put him in n storm-cellar, while you are here."

The dog was one of those "bird-dogs with long legs and almost hairless bodie that locked undressed all the time.

"Oh, don't put him in the storm cella cried Linda May, wringing her hands,

But they paid no attention to her. Ho they ever got him in the cellar (he didn want to go) without finding that there w already a dog in the excavation, is marvel. But marvels often happen. Who the door was closed on him, they went toe amine the hole that had been scratched. least Miss Dollie did; the visitor was sti uninterested, and Linda May was wondering what Lucifer would do. Not a sound, how ever, came from the storm-cellar. But fat in the form of a big black cat, was about bring trouble upon the house of Miss Doll Dudley. Miss Dollie brought it upon he self. Seeing the black cat trying to his behind the honeysuckle vine, she crie "There's that stray cat again, Linda May Chase him! Chase him! What with don't and cats prowling about and scratching t my earth, I lead a -"

She never finished that sentence. Lind May give one "Shoo" at the cat, and the ca ran s raight through the air-hole in th storm-cellar. Now, ever since the bird-do had been shut up in the cellar, Lucifer ha stood glaring at him with his teeth bared the gums. The bird-dog returned the star They seemed turned to stone. In fact eac knew that if he moved so much as a musclthe other would fly at him. They made a cur ous, low noise deep down in their chests the sounded like a man snoring. Suddenly the black cat leaped through the air and l right between them. The dogs gave a wil yelp, the cat an agonized yowl. Hisse howls, barks, mews, the scratching co claws, the sound of things falling! The the pane of glass was broken and out can cat and bird-dog together, with Lucifer clos behind. They ran so fast that their hin legs outran their front, and they rolled ove and bounced straight for the house. Throug the front door they swept, the cat a few fee ahead, the bird-dog and Lucifer after it neck to neck. They crashed through th parlor, sending the chairs dancing off acros the room, and knocking over the little tabl with the pitcher of ice-water and the silve company goblet (that couldn't break, any way). Presently out they came and the ca skinned up the cherry-tree while the bird-do planted himself at its base and licked hi nose every once in a while so he could smel better. Lucifer trotted over to Linda May and wagged his tail at her. He was trying to tell her that he liked the bird-dog prett well, after all. What do you suppose Aun Dollie thought?

W. F. RICHARDSON.

THE UNJUST STEWARD.*

In the parables preceding this, Jesus had reuked he Pharisees for their criticism of him as he friend of sinners. They especially found ault with him because he ate with the publicans, r collectors of the Roman taxes, a class of men bhorred by every zealous Jew. Now that he had astified himself in seeking these lost ones, depite their evil conduct, there might be need that hey, in turn, should be made to see their true havacter, and be brought to repentance. Luke ells us that this parable was spoken to his disciles, but we remember that Jesus had at least ne publican-Matthew-among his chosen folowers, and that many more were drawn about im by the kindness with which he had treated hem, in contrast with the bitter hatred maniested toward them by the multitude. It would ptly describe the wealth of this class to call it he "unrighteous mammon," for much of it was rotten by extortion and fraud.

The trusted steward of a rich man, according o the parable, got to wasting his master's goods, intil his extravagance could no longer be conealed or tolerated. It is not said that he had tolen, but evidently his misuse of that entrusted o him was equivalent to theft; for the reckless se of that which is not one's own betrays a disposition which only lacks occasion to become actual theft. The after conduct of the steward shows his lack of honesty. He is informed by his employer that he is to be removed from his posi tion, and is bidden to balance his accounts with the various tenants of his master, and turn over his office to his successor. His distress is very natural. "I have not strength to endure hard labor," he says, and thus implies that no man will accept him for another position of trust, such as he has abused. "I am ashamed to beg," he adds, for how could he who had been accustomed to order other men humble himself so much as to ask alms of them? He soon makes up his mind what to do, and that is nothing more or less than to use his wits, as men would say, where honest effort is unavailing. So he calls to him each of the debtors of his employer, with whom he himself had agreed upon terms of lease or service, and reduces the amount of his liability, executing a new bond, or altering the former one. He gives them to understand that they are now indebted to him for such reduction, and they tacitly agree to give him a home with them when he has lost his place as steward. It is not long till his former employer learns of the transaction and he commends the "wisdom," or shrewdness rather, of the servant who had outwitted him. There is no commendation intended of the moral quality of the act, for it was essentially dishonest, and the employer who lost by it could not approve it in this sense. But he expressed admiration of the foresight and cunning of his servant, just as one whose house had been robbed might admire the skill with which the burglar effected his entrance and accomplished the robbery.

From this story of deceit and fraud the Master draws a lesson of benevolence and spiritual wisdom. As he enjoins upon his disciples to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves, so does he by this parable teach his followers to be prudent and foreseeing, while shunning the dishonesty of the unfaithful steward. He would have the ministers of righteousness as careful in their use of life's opportunities, with a view of the reward they seek, as are the ministers of the world's sordid ambitions in their efforts after earthly riches.

THE POPULARITY OF Nelson's Teachers' Bibles

is due to their exceptional adaptability for every need of the Bible reader and student.

THE HELPS are just what Sunday-school teachers want. All new and graphically written by the most eminent scholars, with 350 illustrations.

THE CONCORDANCE is the most complete yet produced, as it combines Concordance, Subject Index, pronounces and interprets Scripture proper names, etc., in one A B C list.

THE 12 MAPS are beautifully colored, carefully revised and specially engraved from the latest surveys, with complete index.

The key to the interpretation of this parable is found in the 8th verse, "For the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." For the purposes for which they live their zeal and pruderce often put to shame the lukewarm Christian. In the struggle for increthey show a parience and persistence in strange contrast with the seeming indifference of many professed followers of Christ. If the Church would manifest everywhere the enthusiasm for righteousness that the world does for riches, pleasure and power, who can doubt that the kingdom of God would speedily be triumphant?

"Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when it shall fail they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles." Thus reads the revised version of Jesus' words. It is possible to so use the perishable possessions of earth as to make them count as heavenly riches. Cornelius did so use them when his prayers and alms came up for a memorial before God. Paul enjoins upon every rich man to make just this use of his wealth. He says: "Charge them that are rich in this world that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good; that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold of eternal life." Even the unrighteous mammon may become a help to righteousness, as the vessel, by adjusting of its sail, and proper use of its rudder, makes the west wind drive it toward the setting sun.

But the charity of the Christian is to be prompted by a far higher motive than the shrewd bargain of the unjust steward. He looked no higher than the motto, "One good turn deserves another." He expected his reward in kind and showed the favor to his master's debtors, not from any kindness toward them, but solely that he might "feather his own nest." Christian charity springs from a diviner source. Pity for the unfortunate prompts the disciple of Jesus to give, hoping for nothing again so far as earthly reward is concerned. And the heavenly reward to which he looks is rather the sweet approval of his Savior and his God than the increased amount of joy that shall be measured out to him for his gifts on earth. The true Christian makes his whole life one of giving and loving, while the man of wholly earthly aims makes his one of getting and enjoying. The spirit of Christ is in direct antagonism to that of the world. "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity to God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God." It has been truly said that "to the spiritual nothing is secular, and to the secular nothing is spiritual." He who lives the life of a true Christian must perforce so use his possessions as to make friendships in heaven. God and Christ, the angels and all good men, must love the one who lives for the good he can do, and spends his all with a view to the eternal interests and happiness of his race. There is naught selfish in this, but only the inevitable law of cause and effect.

The lesson of this parable is emphasized by the Master, in some words which we would do well to lay to heart. Now that he has drawn his lesson from the prudence of the unfaithful steward, he would have his disciples understand that in no other feature of his conduct are they to imitate him. He was unfaithful, and that fact utterly condemns him, so far as the moral quality of his stewardship was concerned. He was unfaithful in the use of another's wealth, and therefore should have none of his own to manage. The servant of God who despises or neglects his obligations to his Master will never be entrusted with heavenly riches, as his own. The unfaithful steward will not be promoted from stewardship to proprietorship. God must rule the life, and riches be made subservient to the good of man and the glory of the Master, or else the scul becomes but a slave to sordid motives and all its divine beauty and power are lost. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon."

A High Day.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day for Home Missions should be a high day for our Bible schools. There are many reasons for this that cannot be given in a brief note. The children are ready and willing; all that is needed is some one to direct them. Just a little urging on the part of the officers and teachers of the school will inspire the children to do their utmost to raise their special amounts in their envelopes.

Then the need of this work and of the means that can be raised in this way is so great. "The overflowing scourge" of sin in all its numerous and hideous forms is passing over our land; intemperance and immorality are seeking to drag our young down to degradation and death. The boys and girls of our schools must help save their companions from these awful plagues. Brethren, help in this time of need. Help to place missionaries in every corner of our great and growing cities, as well as in our villages. Help to place our plea before the people in the present crisis of crumbling creeds and falling away from religious standards. Who knows but what thou art come into the kingdom for such a time as this? W. S. LOWE.

TOPIC FOR NOV. 4.

ARE YOU DOING YOUR!BEST?

(Matt. 25:14-30.)

There are not only those who are burying one talent in the ground, but also those who are burying five talents, and even ten. There are many people of great abilities who, through indolence or fear of not getting credit, or envy of rivals, or other selfish considerations, are refusing to make the most of themselves. These shall be far more culpable than the man of but one talent.

But there are a great many more in the onetalent class who refuse to do their best. Those who possess a fair share of talent, say two or five, are usually aware of their capabilities and are excited to action by this knowledge. But those who can boast but small share, or cannot boast at all, are much more likely to settle down to inactivity. They say: "The world is a hard master. It expects much, while I can do but little. I will hide away in a corner where I cannot be seen. What's the use to try?"

And yet, on the other hand, there are some onetalent persons who say: "I am as good a singer, or as good a speaker, or as good a clerk, or as good a salesman as the so-called five-talent and ten-talent people, therefore I'll not serve in the capacity in which I am asked to serve." So the one-talent person, in the stubborn conviction that he is a greater person than he is, buries his ability in the napkin of sulkiness. How many a church and Endeavor Society is cursed with a plenitude of such! How many a business enterprise is handicapped with employees of that stamp!

You may be very sure that the proper amount of opportunity will be given you, in proportion to your ability. If you are a ten-talent man or woman you'll be given a ten-talent job. If you are a two-talent worker, you'll be called upon for two-talent undertakings until you have gained five or ten talents. The thing to do, then, is what you are called to do and the future opportunities will look out for themselves. If you are asked to sing to a small audience, sing! And sing your best! If you are told to perform an obscure work, do it with all your might and there'll be a big work waiting at the end. The bane of all enterprises is the little spirit of those who shirk their part of the work because it is not the whole thing.

If our work is to wash windows, let it be done so thoroughly that no ray of light is stopped by a single fly-speck; if to sweep the floor, let no thimble-full of trash be left under the stairway or in the corner; if to polish up the handle of the big front door, let it be polished till it shall shine and show your face. No matter what the job is, let it be done with all one's might.

After all, the size and importance of things is only relative. Who are we that we should say a thing is great or small? In proportion to the faithfulness of the worker, is the importance of the work.

What Our Leaders say About Boys' and Girls Rally Day.

This is a great day. It is a great opportunity o push forward the glorious gospel of our Reeemer .- A. M. HOOTMAN, Tonawanda, N. Y.

We should make it a great day. 1. The needs f the home field demand it. 2 We can make it great day .- R. G. WHITE, Harrison, O

Make it a great day: Because the cause needs he money; because the children need the educaion and because America needs salvation .- J. E. YNN, Springfield, Ill.

1. Because the A. C. M. S. knows how to use he m ney. 2. Because the A. C. M. S. seeks to eed, not fleece, the flocks in the various states. W. BEDALL, Southern Illinois.

It will serve as a good opportunity for calling he attention of the young people to our home ields and emphasizing in their thoughts the great eeds of these fields. - N. S. HAYNES, Eureka, Ill.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day should be made a reat success as a feature of education for the boys and girls, and also to help swell the receipts or our missions .- D. A. WICKIZER, Beatrice, Neb.

Christian citizenship ought to be taught to hildren. "That righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people" can be best taught in a Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America. - GEO T. SMITH, Winfield, Kan.

This should be made a great day because of the splendid opportunity for educating the young in the importance of home work. Hitherto we have neglected, most grossly neglected, this urgent duty .- F. H. SIMPSON, Massillon, O.

I am in favor of making Rally Day a "great day" because our boys and girls for their own good should be enlisted in Home Mission work. because they can give the cause great help and because it needs their help.—GEO. DARSIE, Frank-

We should make Rally Day a great day. 1. The work is a good one. 2. It is one God wants us to do. 3. We owe it to him. 4. All the beneficiaries sorely need it. 5. It will bless the giver. 6. It will set the pace for all our anniversaries .- A. J. THOMSON, New Albany, Ind.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America should be a great day, because America is a great country, and the boys and girls should be taught to help love it and help save it. What better can they do than to help win America for Christ?-S. H. BARTLETT, Cleveland, O.

Why have Children's Day for America? 1. To win our home land for Christ. 2. To teach our boys and girls the magnitude of their own cou , try. 3. To plant in their young hearts the seeds of true patriotism. 4. To insure, for the future, our nation's life and perpetuate the highest ideals of civilization .- O. L. COOK, State Evangelist,

The Sunday-school Rally Day for America should be a "high day" among the Disciples of Christ because (1) of its educational features. The young people of our churches should have information concerning the home field; (2) we love the mother society and want to participate in her joy in the successful evangelization of America.-CHAS. S. LONG, Lock Haven, Pa.

MORGAN.

Edeth M. Morgan departed this life Oct. the 8th after a brief illness of one week. She was born June 22, 1890, in Pasco, Wash., on the banks of the beautiful Columbia River. She confessed her Savior at the tender age of nine years. She was a lover of Pilgrim's Progress and the New Testament. She was also devoted to church and Sunday-school and prayer meeting, was kind and obedient, made friends with all whom she met. She had a heart full of sympathy for the oppressed, was cheerful, at all times had a smile for all she met. She was not confined to the bed the night before her death. She went to the cupboard, got a cracker and passed it around to the ones of the family who were not at church, likewise a cup of water, in immitation of the communion, which was at about the same hour being observed at the Second Church. Verily she set an example before her departure that we shall not forget till we meet again up yonder. Cause of death: dropsy (acute).

A COMMON TROUBLE

Thousands Suffer From it Without Knowing its Real Character.

No trouble is more common or more misunder stood than nervous dyspepsia. People having it think their nerves are to blame, are surprised that they are not cured by nerve medicines and spring remedies; the real seat of mischief is lost sight of; the stomach is the organ to be looked after.

Nervous dyspeptics often do not have any pain whatever in the stomach, nor perhaps any of the usual symptoms of stomach weakness. dyspepsia shows itself not in the stomach so much as in nearly every other organ; in some cases the heart palpitates and is irregular; in others the kidneys are affected; in others, the bowels are troubled, with loss of flesh and appetite, with the accumulation of gas, sour risings and hear burn.

Mr. A. W. Sharper, of No 61 Prospect St., Indianapolis, Ind., writes as follows: "A motive of pure gratitude prompts me to write these few lines regarding the new valuable medicine, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I have been a sufferer from nervous dyspepsia for the last four years, have used various patent medicine and other remedies without any favorable results. They sometimes give temporary relief until the effects of the medicine wore off. I attribute this to my sedentary habits, being a bookkeeper, with little physical exercise, but I am glad to state that the tablets have overcome all these obstacles, for I have gained in flesh, sleep better and am better in every way. The above is written, not for notoriety, but is based on actual facts."

Respectfully yours, A. W. Sharper, 61 Prospect St., Indianapolis, Ind.

It is safe to say that Stuart's Dyso-psia ablets will cure any stomach weakness or disease except cancer of the stomach. Baking Powder

In Use the most Economical

Greater in leavening strength, a spoonful raises more dough, or goes further.

Working uniformly and perfectly. it makes the bread and cake always light and beautiful, and there is never a waste of good flour, sugar, butter and eggs.

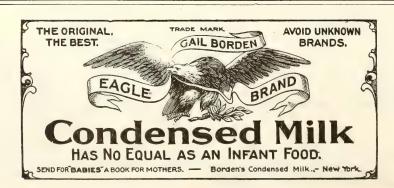

With finer food and a saving of money comes the saving of the health of the family, and that is the greatest economy of all.

Of all the literature of the Disciples of Carist there has been issued no volume of more permanent value than "The Old Faith Re-stated." The underlying thought of this book, as its title indicates, is to present a fresh and independent restatement of the great truths and principles of Christianity as they are apprehended, held and advocated by representative men of the Current Reformation to-day. The volume was edited by J H. Garrison, a d the men chosen to assist him in the re-statement were J. W. McGarvey, G. W. Longan, J. S. Lamar, J. J. Haley, I. B. Grubbs, H. W. Everest, J. B. Briney, D. R. Dangan, A. L. Hobbs, W. K. Pendleton, J. M. Trible, Geo. Plattenburg, B. B. Tyler, A. McLean, F. D. Power and B. W. Johnson. The XVII chapters make a book of 456 pages. Included in the book are full-page half-tone portraits of the authors, with brief biographical sketches. The price of the book is

We have in course of preparation a "Special Christmas Catalogue," which will be illustrated, and will contain descriptive price-list of books, Bibles, etc., especially suitable for Christmas gifts. This catalogue will be sent to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST about December 1. We believe it will be to the advantage of our patrons to defer making Christmas purchases until they examine our catalogue. It will contain a number of surprising offers.

Religion in Missouri University.

A religious census was taken in the Missourl University, when the enrollment had reached 800, with the following results: Of the 800 students the number belonging to or preferring the Christian Church is 178; the different Methodist bodies, 148; the several Presbyterian bodies, 147; the Baptist, 120; Episcopalian 47; Catholic, 19; Congregationalist, 13; Jewish, 13; Lutheran, 7; Unitarian, 5; Church of God, 1; Universalist, 1; and 101 without preference.

This clearly shows the strength of the Christian Church in Missouri and the great need of the Bible work in connection with the state university. It also indicates that Christianity is very strong among the students.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The strike of the coal miners is virtually an end. The larger operators having all ceded to the most important demands of e union, namely, the abolition of the slidg scale and a net advance of 10 per cent. wages, to be partly made up by a decrease the price of powder, the strike has been clared off so far as those operators are ncerned who have accepted the terms. he sliding scale was originally established the request of the miners and some prect that its restoration will be asked for fore long. Unquestionably the victory in is contest rests with the miners, and they we won because they deserved to win. Not aly was their cause just, but their methods procedure have been on the whole admirble. The strike was accompanied by far ss disorder than we had a right to expect, ad the president of the miners' union has own himself to be a wise and skillful ader. He has signally triumphed over the rongest temptation of his position, the emptation to demand more than there was ny prospect of getting. He did not insist pon an explicit recognition of the union nd he encouraged the miners to be content ith a small gain for the present rather nan risk a longer strike, with its consequent affering, its probable disorder and loss of ublic sympathy.

Concerning the Chinese matter, the chief aterest of the week has been absorbed in ratching for indications of the attitude which the Powers will assume toward the inglo-German agreement. The United States s hearty in its support of the purpose which he agreement carries upon its face, i. e., to revent the dismemberment of the Chinese Inpire and to maintain the open door to oreign trade. There are those who suspect hat the real motive of agreement was that Ingland and Germany, each recognizing he other as her most dangerous rival in Central China, might not get into an emparrassing squabble over the Yangste valley before the eyes of all the Powers. The ttitude of France and Russia toward the greement is friendly but not exuberant. They approve the idea of maintaining the erritorial integrity and take no noticeable offense at the apparent menace contained in he third and fourth provisions. Meanwhile, he beginning of peace negotiations is deaved and the rebellion in Southern China is inchecked. The Boxers, so far from being overawed by the opposition, have issued a new and bitter anti-foreign proclamation. The statement comes officially (but not necessarily truthfully) from Chinese sources that the Emperor and his court will return to Pekin within a month.

There is no reason to despair of China. Things may move slowly in the Orient, but in due time, if the civilized world faints not, China will take her place among the Christian nations of the world. Sir Robert Hart's view of the situation is probably too pessimistic, but it will take time to accomplish the desired reforms in the celestial kingdom. In dealing with the peoples of the East, we may well remember the lines of Kipling:

"It is not good for the Christian man To worry the Aryan brown; For the white man riles, and the brown man smiles, And it weareth the Christian down. And the end of the fight is a tombstone white With the name of the late deceased, And the epitaph clear, "A foot lieth here Who tried to hustle the East."

Mr. Bryan's visit to New York week before last was an event of much importance in the campaign. He addressed four enthusiastic audiences aggregating probably 60,000. His hearty endorsement of Croker with the cry, "Great is Tammany and Croker is its prophet," surprised many who remember the cool relations between the candidate and New York's champion corruptionist four years ago. The following are some of the newspaper comments from both sides. The New York Journal (Dem.) says:

The citadel of Democracy has welcomed Democracy's leader. Wherever the advancing empire may have sapped the old American ideals, it is plain that the republic does not lack defenders in New York. Mr. Bryan told his audience modestly: "I am not vain enough to believe that any large part of your enthusiasm is intended as a personal tribute to the candidate, for in a cause like this the individual counts for nothing except as he may be the instrument used by the people to carry out their own will." That was Mr. Bryan's only mistake. The individual counts for everything in this case. It means much to the American people whether we have a jellyfish for a president or a man of character, strength and convictions—a man to whom "plain duty" in December remains plain duty in March. We have tried the jellyfish-now let us have the man.

The Baltimore News (Independent Dem.)

Mr. Bryan has missed a great opportunity. His appearance in New York was his last chance to restore, in the public mind, something of the impression he had made in his Indianapolis speech. This chance he has completely thrown away. No one can read his speech and come away with the conviction that this man really feels the tremendous importance of the issue upon the decision of which he declares that the continuance of free government depends.

It is scarcely worth while to quote the comments of the Republican press. They uniformly insisted that the ovation was largely manufactured by Croker and declared that, by the alliance with Tammany, Mr. Bryan has forfeited his claim to be considered the champion of purity in politics. The Baltimore Herald (independent, anti-Bryan) makes these comments:

There was everything in the speech to please and flatter the unthinking crowd. There was nothing to arouse the confidence of thoughtful voters. Concerning that most vital of all campaign issues-free silver, in which the merchants and manufacturers of New York are so deeply interested—there was not a word. Not even a hint that Mr. Bryan, if elected, would relax from his dangerous insistence that he would do his best to place the government on a silver basis. There has been no more flagrant instance of campaign dodging in our political history. And yet the particular boast of his partisans is that Bryan is "an honest man."

In regard to the advantages of the present method of campaigning, whereby the rival candidates rush about the country making speeches at the rate of a dozen a day, there is much to be said both pro and con. It ought to be a season of political education, in which the voters will be helped to cast an intelligent and discriminating ballot. But more often it is merely an occasion for senseless and ear-splitting enthusiasm. The spellbinder who is most in demand is not he who can give the soundest instruction in the issues of the campaign, but he who can most effectively gibe at the other party, who can entertain the crowd, who can deliver the liveliest repartee. Even candidates for the highest offices in the nation pursue the same method, either from personal preference or because they know they will not "take" without that cheap appeal to the lightest (if not the worst) motives of a crowd which likes to be tickled. There are those who believe that both Mr. Bryan and Governor Roosevelt have weakened rather than strengthened their positions by assuming the role and, to a degree, the methods of the common political spellbinder.

The welcome of the City Imperial Volunteers lately returned from South Africa to London, was the occasion of a wild outburst of mingled patriotic fever and hooliganism. According to the press accounts, London's millions turned out en masse to welcome the returning soldiers. Royalty and nobility honored them with messages and with their presence at the parade. The crowds became so dense that many were killed and many more crippled; and at night, when the police were even more powerless than they had been during the day, the celebration degenerated into a bacchanalian orgy which filled Fleet Street and the Strand with a mass of hilarious brawlers. The press reports of this revel may be exaggerated, but no one who knows the capacity of an English crowd of the lower class for booze-begotten joy and the good natured quarrelsomeness that goes with it, will consider the accounts at all improbable.

Mr. Kruger has sailed from South Africa and will land at Marseilles. It is given out that he will make a sojourn in Europe in the interest of his "health." It is also rumored quite unofficially that he will attempt to enlist the European Powers in the struggle against Great Britain in the interest of the late South African republics. Probably a statesman of Mr. Kruger's acumen will appreciate the futility of attempting to secure intervention after the war is over. To be sure there are still many Boers under arms. One account puts the number as high as 15,000 in bands of about 300. Nevertheless, the war is over, whatever disturbances may remain. There is no reason why Mr. Kruger should not have an honorable reception in Europe, considering the prominent place which he has occupied and the many admirable qualities which he possesses.

It is always a matter of congratulation whenever any of our infant industries win triumphs in foreign markets. Within the last few days American competition in the steel trade has compelled the British steel rail combine to lower its prices. Too many of the big orders have recently been going to American mills; one from the Dutch East Indies for 10,000 tons, another for 2,000 tons for the Irish railway and one for 4,500 tons for the London and Brighton railway. There is no question but that our infant industries are doing quite well.

It will be noticed that in most of the election forecasts Kentucky is placed in the doubtful list. Whether or not it is really doubtful depends upon the way in which the Goebel election law is administered. The Kentucky legislature spent nearly two months in special session trying to enact a new election law. The result is a law, which, though far from satisfactory to the anti-Goebel contingent, is better than the former measure. The worst feature of it is that it does not go into effect until after the presidential election. Consequently the election will be held under the Goebel law, as the obstructionists and time-killers who prevented the earlier passage of the new law doubtless intended that it should be. Under this law, all the judges and other officers of election will be Democrats. The situation presents an awful temptation. There are few states in which any party could be safely trusted to conduct an election and count the ballots with no oversight by the opposite party to insure a straight count. The actual vote in Kentucky is doubtful; the returns will depend upon the ability and inclination of the party now dominant to resist this temptation.

Among the learned men of the nineteenth century, there was probably not one, who, for sheer erudition, for depth of research and breadth of general information, excelled Professor Max Muller, who died a few days ago at his home in Oxford. A German by birth and education, an Englishman by long residence, and a cosmopolitan in the breadth of his interests and his knowledge, he united within himself qualities not often found together. To the artistic literary instinct which he inherited from his father, who was a poet, he added a genius for music and a thorough knowledge of music which led him in his youth to look forward to a career as a professional musician. With his German birth and training, he inherited the teutonic capacity for intellectual drudgery and became, while yet a young man, an authority on the grammar and literature of Sanskrit and all matters pertaining to philology. It was in the pursuance of studies in this line that he came to Oxford and was induced to remain there, ultimately becoming professor of philology. One does not appreciate the variety of his powers until one thinks of him as not only the editor of the vast and learned series of translations of "The Sacred Books of the East," but as also the author of "Memories; a Musical Romance," a tender and beautiful story.

IN WHAT SHALL WE GLORY?

There is, perhaps, no truer test of character, whether of an individual man or of any body of men, than the nature of the things in which they glory. Many of our readers have just returned from the great national gathering of the Disciples of Christ in Kansas City. Perhaps some of us felt the disposition while there, viewing the vast multitude of Disciples gathered from all parts of the country, to glory in numbers. Frequent reference was made to the fact of our rapid growth, and to our present numerical strength. This was natural, and, within proper limits, entirely legitimate. We would be less than human, rather than more, not to be grateful for the tokens of divine favor manifested in our rapid growth. Still, it would be a great mistake for us to glory in mere numbers. There are many organizations that far outnumber us, and the existence of some of these is, to say the least, of doubtful benefit in the advancement of the kingdom of God. Let us not glory in numbers.

We have many men of fine ability and of noble character. We would feel willing to compare them with any equal number of men in any religious body in their efficiency as preachers of the gospel, as Christian scholars, as writers and authors. We appreciate them and admire them. We would be ungrateful and unappreciative not to do so. But it would be a great mistake for us to glory in men. Men may come and men may go, but that in which men should glory must go on forever. Let us never forget to honor the men whom God has placed as leaders in our great movement, nor fail to listen to their admonitions and instructions; but let us not glory in men.

There is a large amount of wealth repl sented by the Disciples of Christ in the country. This is not true of us to the sai extent, perhaps, that it is of some older a ligious bodies, more largely represented that section of the country where the lar est wealth is concentrated. Nevertheles we have an abundance of wealth in the po session of our membership, and, along wi this wealth, men and women of social cul ure and prestige. The kingdom of God h need for both wealth and social influence and we ought to be grateful for these bles ings. But it would be a great sign of wea ness if we should glory in wealth, or in s cial position, or influence. These are mere passing phases of life, having an incident but not a vital relation to the success of ar righteous cause. God forbid that we shou gl ry in uncertain riches, or in the fickl ness of social position.

Perhaps some one is ready to say that w have a knowledge of the Bible, a clearne of apprehension of its divine contents, i which we may justly glory. But let us no glory in knowledge, not even in the knowledge or intellectual apprehension of the literary record of God's revelation whice we call the Bible. We may well seek to increase our understanding of that wonderful volume and of its inspired revelation, but it would be a fatal mistake if we should regard our intellectual resources, even as the biblical matters, a ground for glorying. Let us not glory in knowledge, or in any other cour own poor human attainments.

Paul, the great thinker and theologian of the first century, gave the true ground o glorying when he said: "But far be it from me to glory, save in the cross of our Lor Jesus Christ, through which the world hat been crucified unto me, and I unto th world." By "the cross of our Lord Jesu Christ" the apostle means the whole redemy tive truth revealed in Jesus Christ. H means that revelation of God which has fo its climax the cross of Christ, unveiling th heart of God, and manifesting His love for sinning world, and His willingness to accep even sinners who would come to Him by th way of the cross in a penitent, obedien faith. The great apostle had seen th transforming power of this doctrine of sal vation through the cross of Christ, and h said, "I will glory in this and in nothing else." "For neither is circumcision any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new crea ture." He would glory in no ordinance, o statute, or pedigree, or doctrine, or system or anything else which had not the power t make out of sinful man "a new creature.

We cannot keep this great truth to steadily in view. There is constant dange of our glorying in matters that are wholly subordinate or incidental. But now, as old, there is but one thing in which these who call themselves Christians may glory namely, "the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. Only through that can the world be crucified unto us, and we unto the world. It this sign we conquer. Turning away from this central, fundamental, vital truth, of God manifest in Christ, suffering for the world.

salvation, we have no gospel left that has in it any power to lift the world out of its moral degradation up into the light and life of God.

CONVENTION PERSONNEL AND COMMENT.

We give a few paragraphs here that were crowded out last week, relative to the Kansas City Convention.

Among other things that may be said of the Kansas City Convention is this, that it was very strongly anti-saloon and prohibition in its sentiments. Every utterance against this national curse met with enthusiastic applause. The resolution pledging the members of the convention to use their efforts to suppress the liquor traffic, was received with applause and passed without a dissenting voice. There is, perhaps, no religious body on this continent that has taken a more advanced stand than the Disciples of Christ against the liquor traffic, which has proved to be such a desolating curse to so many homes and hearts, and which threatens such peril to our national life. We are glad that this is so. It is in perfect harmony with that supreme emphasis which, as a religious body, we have ever sought to lay on the ethical side of our religious life. A Christianity which does not find expression in pure ethics cannot be the religion of Christ, who is the supreme moral Teacher of all the ages.

While the brethren in Kansas City did not pledge themselves to free entertainment of the delegates, but only to provide suitable accommodations at reasonable prices for those who attended, yet many of the brethren, perhaps most of them, threw open their houses to the delegates and entertained them freely. It was the good fortune of the editor of this paper, together with his wife and niece, to be entertained in the hospitable home of W. F. Richardson, pastor of the First Church, where several other delegates were also entertained. It added no little to the enjoyment of our stay in Kansas City to have the privilege of intimate association with Brother and Sister Richardson and their charming family.

"We are turning from books written about the Bible, and away from theories of inspiration and even the alleged results of critical investigation, to study the Bible itself."— Burris A. Jenkins at Convention.

In other words, the time has come to quit our profitless controversy about mere words and technical terms and critical processes, and come directly to the study of the Bible itself in the best light we can get from all sources. Let us cease making such a show of tools with which we work, and exhibit to the people rather the product of our honest researches in a clearer presentation of the teachings of the inspired volume. It is not uncommon, when people become enamoured with any new rules of interpretation and methods of investigation, to make these so prominent as to call attention away from the end which they are to serve. It was not unnatural that this should have been the case with the critical method known as the Higher Criticism. There is reason to believe, however that among well-informed people this period has been passed, and that henceforth we shall hear less about the legitimacy and necessity of certain literary and historical methods of criticism, and more concerning the contents of that inspired word which it is the object of all true investigation to make plain to the common mind.

The social feature of our conventions is becoming more prominent each year. This seems almost a necessity. The only thing to guard is allowing it to become so prominent as to encroach seriously upon the time of the convention. A reception was tendered by Mrs. D. O. Smart on one afternoon to the foreign missionaries of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Mr. and Mrs. T. P. Haley on one of the evenings. from five to seven, gave a reception to all the foreign missionaries and their friends. Both of these receptions were largely attended. Mrs. Dr. Ridge entertained a large company of friends at "The Baltimore" for dinner, where they enjoyed a pleasant social occasion. Mrs. Bacon gave a reception in honor of Professor C. L. Loos, which was attended by a large number of the Bethany alumni and friends. Besides these there were smaller gatherings of congenial spirits innumerable, who took occasion to spend an hour together as they could find opportunity during the convention. We have already mentioned the college reunions, which were greatly enjoyed by the older boys and girls as well as the younger. The social feature, while not the main purpose of these conventions, is not by any means unimportant in the development and unification of the life of the brotherhood.

The statistical report of G. A. Hoffmann contained many interesting figures. In 1850 the United States had a population of 25,-000,000. Our membership at the same time was 118,000. The present population of the United States is 75,000,000 or three times as many as there were in 1850. In 1900 we have 1,150,000 or nearly ten times as many as fifty years ago. While some of the religious bodies have only kept pace with the increase of the population, and others have gained as high as six times, our own increase leads them all.) Following is the financial feature of this statistical report, showing the receipts of the various interests during the year past:

The colleges were well represented in this Convention, as was meet, not only by their graduates, but by members of their faculties. President J. W. McGarvey, of the Bible College of Kentucky University, and Prof. C. L. Loos of the same institution, were present, while Butler was represented by Prof. J. D. Forrest, Dean Jabez Hall, Dean of the Bible College, and probably other members of the faculty. Eureka College was represented by President Hieronymus; Drake, by Chancellor William Bayard Craig, Dean A. M. Haggard, Prof. Clinton Lockhart, and by its founder, General Drake. Bethany was there in the person of President Kersey; Christian University by President Dungan, and perhaps others. Daughters College by President J. B. Jones; Caristian College by Mrs. W. T. Moore, principal; Central Christian College by President J. W. Ellis; the Missouri Bible College by W. T. Moore; the Disciples' Divinity House, University of Chicago, by Dean H. L. (Gal. 6:1.6; Rom. 15:1-7.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meting Topic, Nov. 7.)
CENTRAL TRUTH: No man liveth unto himself and no man dieth unto himself; we must be sharers of each other's burdens, the strong helping the weak, in order to meet the obligations we owe to one another, and to fulfill Christ's law.

Christianity is pre-eminently a social religion. True, its first con ern is that of the individual's relations to God, but after that it has to do with man's relations to his fellowmen. Nearly all the Christian virtues have their root and reason in these human relationships. Such virtues as honesty, righteousness, truthfulness, patience, unselfishness, charity, chastity, brotherly love, etc., find their opportunity for exercise in the relations of our social life. Isolated from his fellow-beings, man would have little opportunity for cultivating these virtues.

It is a proof of the divinity there is in the Bible and especially in the religion of Christ, that they put themselves always on the side of the weak to plead their cause. This is the more remarkable from the fact that when the Bible was written, and when Christianity had its origin, power and might were almost deified, while the dependent classes of society were despised and neglected. Christianity assumes that the strong will take care of themselves, but it is concerned about the weak and over-burdened. Moreover, it recognizes the fact that the strong need the weak, as an opportunity for developing their unselfishness, quite as much as the weak need the strong. There is this two-fold motive, therefore, which the inspired writers have in view in inculcating the duty of caring for the poor and assisting the weak.

There is something very tender and touching in this admonition of the great apostle in behalf of a class of people so largely represented in our churches now, as then: "Brethren, even if a man be overtaken in any trespass, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in a spirit of meekness; looking to thyself, lest thou also be tempted." There is no other way, perhaps, in which the presence or absence of a genuine Christian spirit is manifested more clearly than in the way we treat a brother who has been overtaken in any trespass, or who has erred in judgment concerning some doctrine of the Scriptures. The spiritual always seek to "restore such an one in a spirit of meekness," not unmindful of the fact that they themselves are not infallible; whereas, the unspiritual member will assume an attitude of hostility and denunciation far removed from the spirit of meekness or of brotherly love. It is exceedingly instructive to note how tenderly Christ dealt with the errors of His disciples, bearing with their infirmities patiently, pointing out their mistakes by indicating the larger truth. The smoking flax he did not quench; the bruised reed he did not break. He came into the world not to condemn men, but to save them.

When the apostle says: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ," we recognize the statement at once as the very out-breathing of the spirit of Christ. Christ's whole life was but an illustration of this truth. There are burdened hearts all about us which we may lighten and cheer by words of sympathy and deeds of kindness. There is nothing that lightens the burden of the human heart like human sympathy, unless it be divine sympathy, and these two are so blended that the one argues the presence of the other.

The "law of Christ" referred to here is not a statutory enactment, but it is the very principle of Christ's life—the principle of the cross—the law of self-sacrifice. It is Christ's ideal of life as illustrated by Him during His earthly ministry. Let no one deceive himself with the idea that he is fulfilling the law of Christ, and is a Christian, if he is living simply for himself and bearing no part of the burdens of his fellowmen.

It was a new ideal of life, a new standard of righteousness, indicated by the apostle, when he said to the brethren at Rome: "Now we that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves. Let each one of us please his neighbor for that which is good, unto edifying." What authority does the apostle give for this new and strange doctrine of life? Whence this oughtness on the part of the strong to bear the infirmities of the weak and to seek to please others rather than themselves? The apostle answers: "For Christ also pleased not himself; but, as it is written, the reproaches of them that reproached thee fell upon me." Christ's example was deemed sufficient to indicate the law of life for the Christian. He was always bearing the infirmities of the weak and always lifting burdens from weary hearts. He never thought of pleasing himself. He turned away from the glory, honor, power, and riches of the world, that He might tread the lowly path of self-denial and self-sacrifice in the service of his fellowmen. If we admire and love our Lord for this supreme unselfishness, ought we not to cultivate, and manifest in our own lives, the same grace? Instead, therefore, of indulging so much in the spirit of criticism and fault-finding, we would do well to encourage and help those who are weak, and to lift the burdens from hearts that are weary. Only thus can we fulfil the law of Christ.

PRAYER.

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that when we were weak, and without strength, Thou didst send Thine only begotten Son to bear our burdens, even our sins in his own body on the cross. We thank Thee for His unselfish life and we pray that we may be inspired by His teaching and example to bear the infirmities of the weak, to deal gently with the erring, and so fulfill the divine ideal. Forgive us, we pray Thee, for selfishness in the past, and help us to live more Christly lives in the future. In His name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

"Just for to day." It is the refrain of a tender solo we heard in church yesterday that lingers with us. The song so sweetly sung asked not grace for the long vistas of the future, not even for to morrow, but "just for to-day." This seems to be wise and in perfect harmony with the teaching of our Lord who taught his disciples to pray for "daily bread." When we are assailed by temptations and are conscious of our own weakness, one day at a time is about all our faith can compass. It is a good way to conquer an evil habit whose power has fastened itself upon us, to ask God for strength to resist it, just for one day. This victory achieved, one feels stronger to renew the conflict on the morrow. A succession of daily victories gives strength of faith and courage at last to put the evil habit under one's feet forever. It is a good way, too, when one is bearing a burden of sorrow or suffering which seems too heavy, for him to seek strength from the heavenly Father, "just for to day." His grace will be suffi-cient for us. When burdens of labor and responsibility press heavily upon us, it is not good to look too far ahead and think of all there is to be done, and of all the problems there are to be solved, yet in the futu e. Rather let us ask wisdom and grace for the day's work just ahead of us. day's work just ahead of us. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let us not burden it with the evil of other days, past or future.

What surprises await the great body of American people within the next week! If we are to believe the daily papers, each of the two leading political parties confidently expects a great victory on Tuesday next. Indeed, according to statements from the leaders of both sides, it is to be a perfect "landslide" in favor of the party to which the leaders respectively belong. We have observed that men who read the party organs of one party exclusively are most confident that their party is going to carry everything before it! Claiming everything has become a part of the game of politics, however, and the forecasts of party leaders are no longer taken seriously by men who keep their heads during political campaigns. Many of the leaders who now appear so confident of the success of their party will tell you, after the election is over, that they foresaw defeat several weeks before the election occurred, but felt it their duty to keep up a brave front to the end! Very few people will admit that they were greatly surprised at the results of the election. Men prefer, as a rule, to admit lack of can dor, rather than lack of political sagacity and far sightedness. Occupying the serene height of non partisanship we could tell our readers just how [we think] the election is going, but we are not going to do it. do not care to torment the defeated candidates before their time. Besides it is only a week to wait, and then they will find out for themselves.

We are, however, prepared to assure our readers of one fact, and that is that the government will go right on doing business at the old stand, as usual. The Stars and Stripes will continue to float in the breeze, and will look as beautiful to patriotic eyes as in the past. Nor is there the slightest danger that the flag will be hauled down from any place where it ought to float as the emblem of freedom and the ensign of hope. Alas! too, monopolies will continue. for some time to come, to declare the largest possible dividends without regard to the rights of other people. Political "bosses," too, will continue their nefarious business, and municipal misgovernment in all our great cities will cry to heaven for reform. The liquor-power will maintain its defiant attitude toward Christian civilization, and politicians will continue to pay homage at its shrine. All these reforms and others await measures far more radical than anything that is to be decided by the present election. Education, evangelization, the extension of the kingdom of God-only these can remove such dark blots as we have named from the face of our civilization. Behind the ballot are the home, the school, the church, and these must do their work well before the ballot becomes the potent power it ought to be in lifting burdens from the necks of the people.

There is another fact, too, that we can assure our readers of, and it is one for which we cannot be too grateful, namely, that whatever disappointments to individuals or to parties may be involved in the results of the pending election, there will be instant and universal acquiescence in the decision of the people at the polls, whenever that decision is known. This is something to be grateful for. Until people reach the state of enlightenment and of self-control which enables them to submit to defeat at the polls without insurrection and violence, they are not capable of self-government. has never been but one exception to the rule of acquiescence to the will of the majority in our national history, and that grew out of conditions so unique, and now, happily, no longer in existence, as to render its repetition in the future wholly improbable. is a spectacle which the civilized world has always looked upon with admiration, that of men taking up power and laying it down again at the will of the people, expressed through the ballot box. The one thing we all feel certain about is that no matter whether Mr. McKinley or Mr. Bryan shall receive a majority of the electoral votes of the states of this Union, the defeated party and its candidates will accept the decision as final, and all the governmental processes will continue peacefully and smoothly, as heretofore.

Questions and Answers.

I find an abundance of food for thought in the perusal of your Question and An wer Department. Will you kindly answer me the following questions:

- 1. What remedy have you to propose for the difficulty of keeping up the finances of the local church, where the burden generally falls upon a few?
- 2. What do you think of the plan we are thinking of adopting in our local church of opening an account with the bank, depositing collections with the bank, pay our bills by chaques, and have the bank notify us of any overdraft, so that we can go to the church members for money, not to pay the preacher or the jonitor, but to meet overdrafts in the bank?

An Elder.

- 1. Two things are necessary in order to keep the financial condition of the church as good as that of a well conducted bank. The first of these is that the nembership of the church be converted and have the spirit of liberality and love for the cause of Christ implanted in their hearts. The second is proper training in the duty of regular, systematic and proportionate giving. There is great lack in most of our churches on the second point, passing by for the present the first condition named. It is not sufficiently impressed upon the minds of the members when they first enter the church and begin their Christian life that it is a part of their Christian duty to bear their proportionate part in all the expenses necessary for the successful on-going of the church. Many members have very loose, not to say immoral, ideas on this question of financial responsibility to the church. They must be taught on this subject as on every other subject until they have as much conscience on the subject of finances as, for instance, on the subject of baptism. In addition to this there should be some simple, practical method by which all the members may be reached with a request for a subscription to the annual expenses of the church.
- 2. The success of this plan will depend largely on how much pride the members of the congregation have in maintaining the financial credit of their church in the eyes of the community. There is danger that a large proportion of the members will feel that they are in no way responsible for the debt that has been created and will ignore it. It is very difficult to distribute among the members a sense of responsibility for the financial obligations of the church. Nothing but constant teaching will accomplish this, and even this will succeed only among those who are sincerely trying to be Christians and want to do what is right. We shall be glad to hear from our correspendent later as to how his bank plan has succeeded in bringing the members to

I notice what you say in your issue of October 4 concerning the continuation of apostles in the church. Do I understand you right that there are no apostles since the first Twelve died? If so, how will you harmonize this with the Scripture that says that when Christ ascended He "led captivity captive and gave gifts unto men," and that He gave "some to be apostles," etc., "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ till we all come unto the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ?"

Mrs. G. A. Reynolds.

Granada, Miss.

Yes, we said there were no successors to the original apostles, because they are still in authority. Their testimony concerning Chr st, their teaching, their exhortation, inspired as they were by the spirit of God, have come down to us in the New Testament, and they are still sitting upon their twelve apostolic thrones judging the tribes of spiritual Israel. There is, therefore, no conflict between this position and the Scripture quoted. Through the ministry of the apostles, continued to us by the agency of the Holy Spirit which dwelt in them, the church is growing into the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, and will continue so to do until it comes into a full grown man; "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

Is it proper for us to baptize in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, seeing that the apostles baptized in the name of Jesus only (Acts 2:38), and seeing that baptism is a burial in the death of Christ, and not in the death of the Father or the Holy Spirit?

H. C. Varner.

According to the commission given by Christ to His apostles, which is our authority for baptizing at all, we are authorized to baptize believers "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," and we do this in the name or by the authority of Christ. The passage referred to in Acts does not differ from the commission. Peter tells the people who asked what they should do to "Repent and be baptized every one of you upon the name of Jesus Christ," etc. The baptismal formula is not here given. They were simply told that this repentance and baptism was enjoined upon them by the authority of Christ just as the commission declares. The Revised Version (see Matt. 28:19) renders the commission, "baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." This word "into" denotes transition or change of relationship. It does not indicate the authority by which the act is done, as that is shown in the preface to the commission-"all authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye, therefore," etc. The baptism, therefore, is by the authority, or upon the name of Christ, and "into the name of the Father,"

A man marries a woman who he understands left her former husband for "gospel reasons;" he discovers after living with her several years that the real cause of separation was not fornication, but his drunkenness and cruelty to her; it is probable that fornication was committed before she left him; and it is certain that he was guilty after she left him. She remained single for seventeen years, during which time he "took up with" two different women, and finally disappeared from view, either dying or removing to some distant part of the country. After she had lost sight of him for a long time and knew nothing of him, she was married a recond time. These parties are both prominent members of the Church of Christ, and in the effort for higher attainments in the divine life, this matter is giving them trouble. What should they do?

There has been, apparently, no intentional wrong-doing in this case on the part of either the present husband or wife. The only thing for them to do, as Christians, is to maintain the relation of husband and wife which they have assumed, sacredly. Any attempt to undo what has been done would result in far greater wrong that any irregularity in their marriage growing out of an imperfect knowledge of the facts. They have no need to be troubled in conscience, but should seek to live loyally to their marriage vows.

If a young woman marries a man believing him to be honest and straightforward, and finds out after marriage that he is dishonest and has deceived her, is she at liberty to seek a divorce, and, should she marry again, would she do wrong in so doing?

M. E.

When the voung woman married the man in question, she took him "for better or for worse," and if he turned out worse, that is her misfortune, but it is also her opportunity. Probably she can bring to bear upon him an influence to reform his life stronger than any that has ever been exerted. Let her, at least, make an effort to save him before she seeks separation from him. Young married people must not grow dissatisfied when they begin to find out each other's faults. Rather let them seek to correct their faults and to help each other to a better life. Marriage is one of the ways which God has established for making men and women better and purer. We would always advise a young woman to undertake her work of reforming the young man before marriage, but if she takes the chances of marrying first, she must not abandon the work of reformation. According to Paul, the unsanctified husband is sanctified by the Christian wife and the relationship is thus made sacred. It is better for individuals to bear some hardships of this kind than for society to be demoralized and degraded by thoughtless marriages and easy divorces.

What do you think of the custom sometimes engaged in by professed Christians, in this remote section, of betting "treats" about little things? Isn't this gambling on a small scale?

Inquirer.

Of course it is, and we would regret to believe that there are many professed Christians who would engage in this species of gambling, not to say anything of the abominable custom of "treating," which, in connection with intemperance, is one of the greatest sources of drunkenness. Christians should have no fellowship with these unfruitful works of darkness.

HOW TO STUDY THE HISTORI-CAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

A. M. CHAMBERLAIN.

Here is a question of method. Fortunately it is not a question of the best method, else, in deciding that, the study might be entirely lost sight of. This article only aims to be suggestive to people inspired with a desire to know with accuracy something of the great "Old Revelation" of God to men. No method of fixing in memory accurate knowledge is surer than that of tabulating it, if we construct our own tables. Mental mastery is a sort of intellectual cabinetmaking, and at this I wish to set you, for the time.

We are to deal with seventeen writings and four thousand years of history. In spite of inaccuracies, we will follow the chronology of Bishop Ussher, because his inaccuracies are not vital, and for the most part, exist, so far as they can be proved to exist at all, in the early, obscure portion of the records.

- 1. Let the student now take a sheet of foolscap, and turning it sidewise, through the center of its length draw a line twelve inches long. This will stand for our four thousand years of time.
- 2. Make a mark upon this line every inch and a half. These spaces will stand for periods of five hundred years. We shall remember these dividing points and their relations a great deal better if we connect each one with a prominent name or event close at hand. As we can do no better we shall write at the first division from the left, Enoch, at the second, Noah, at the third, The Flood, at the fourth, Abraham, at the fifth, Red Sea, at the sixth, Solomon, at the seventh, Restoration. At the end of the line write Jesus. At the beginning, Adam. Under each name, the proper date figure for that point, and we have an outline of concrete chronology upon which to hang our study of the Old Testament records.
- 3. An inch and a half from the top of the sheet draw another line parallel with the first, and we shall be ready to begin our "Study of the Historical Books of the Old Testament." You already know that these are seventeen in number, and you know them by name in the order of their occurrence in our Bibles. We are now going to arrange them on our scale of chronology.
- 4. Examination shows that eleven of the books will cover the scale to a point beyond the last division mark, with the exception of one narrow space for which we have among these no book at all. This leaves six books which are either repetitions or only related in a collateral or subordinate manner to the real chain of historical happenings. These six collateral books are Leviticus, Deuteronomy, Ruth, First and Second Chronicles and Esther.
- 5. Of the eleven books which really give a fairly connected history, the first is Genesis. We are going to draw a cross line at the point in our scale where its record closes. This is about half way between Abraham and the Red Sea. We will draw the - line clear across the foolscap sheet and above the upper line we will write GENESIS; under that "Beginning" and just above the line 2250. This will not prevent our remembering that this "Beginning" reaches far back into the mist and chaos which antedate human history. It will be proper for you to stop right here and say, "What a wonderful book. How scanty a record. What scattered sun rays penetrating that cloudy morning of the world." This, I shall leave you to continue at your pleasure. You will stop for a moment, however, to look up the number of chapters which hold all that precedes the call of Abram.

- 6. Run a dotted line from one parallel to the other at the point marked Abraham, and to the left of this indicate the number of chap ers mentioned above. Now, you may stop at your will and study the appearance of your table. Between times, as you look at this old record, read doubtless more than once, you will run lines down from the middle line of chronology to the bottom of the foolscap sheet at the five hundred year points in Genesis, and, in the compartments thus made, you will note for each successive period the prominent names and events which you wish to remember. If there is a passage which you think you ought to memorize, note it as well, but be discriminating in this. In the last compartment which belongs to Genesis, write the prominent characters and be sure to note the last thing recorded in the book. If you have done this carefully, I am pretty sure that you will know something of Genesis which you did not know before.
- 7. Now take up Exodus, "The Way Out," with its record of 250 years in round numbers, and chart it in similar fashion. Note in the compartment below the line of chronology about a half dozen prominent subdivisions of the record of Exodus. I will suggest for this book, the following: 1. The Bondage in Egypt. 2. The Early Life and Call of Moses. 3. The Ten Plagues. 4. The Deliverance at the Red Sea. 5. The Law Given at Sinai. 6. The Building of the Tabernacle. There are some other things that you will want to remember when you have become somewhat familiar with these, such as the details of the ten plagues, incidents on the way to Sinai, and the location and exact language of the ten commandments.
- 8. Now we are arrived at the book called Leviticus, which is not a history in any strict sense of the word, but is a compilation of laws based on that which was given to Moses at Sinai, and properly belongs in this period of Exodus and Numbers. Write the name in the compartment under Exodus between the two parallel lines and proceed with the historical record of Numbers.
- 9. You will find by brief examination that this book covers practically the forty years spent in the wanderings in the wilderness, and you will draw a line across the foolscap sheet that will fairly represent such a lapse of time on the scale. It will be rather narrow and you will have to do some fine writing. In the upper compartment

- write Numbers and under that "Wilderness" and lowest, 40. Now, in the lowest compartment place notes that will call up in order the most prominent happenings of this forty years of wandering. You can use your choice and have from seven to fifteen or twenty, but, whether you take few or many, after you have chosen them, remember them as belonging to "Numbers."
- 10. Here is Deuteronomy, which is, like Leviticus, in large measure extra-historical, and you will write its name in the middle compartment under Numbers, with the one or two historical items which it really adds to the other records noted in parentheses following.
- 11. We have next to consider the two books known as Joshua and Judges, which, with the first eight chapters of First Samuel, deal with a period of about four hundred years following immediately upon the entrance of the children of Israel into Canaan. This makes so distinct an epoch that we will do best to group all these items in the upper compartment with the figure-400 underneath, the period being in reality a little short of four hundred years. As we shall see that two forty-year periods are to follow before we reach the epoch of Solomon at the 1000 B. C. mark, we shall need to accommodate matters by not making our 400year space of full actual width by scale. It is frequently necessary in tabulating in this fashion to make small spaces a little larger than they properly should be in order to have them large enough to hold the matter in intelligible shape and this must be rectified by a corresponding reduction in some of the larger spaces. Were the scale twice or three times as large this would be unnecessary, and you may desire to enlarge it with accurate spacing after this first examination is completed. That will prove a good review. As there are three books to be served with notes in the space below the line of chronology, we shall have to divide it into three parts. You will note down the prominent records of Joshua and Judges, seven or eight each, and five or six for the eight chapters of Samuel, each in separate divisions, and then you will place "Ruth," another of the collateral records, in the middle compartment, with any notes you desire.
- 12. Six books of the main history remain for study and treatment, together with three that may be dealt with as collateral, but it will be noticed that we have already begun a practice which we shall find it wise to continue, viz., that of breaking the books up at their ratural topical division points instead of insisting on the arbitrary divisions which have gained place in the past.
- 13. The remainder of the book called First Samuel will be our next section for study. It covers a period of substantially forty years, which fact you will properly record. We shall find its epoch to be "The Kingdom under Saul," and to indicate that, it will be well to write the name of Saul at the bottom of the middle compartment just above the line of chronology. There is no part of the Old Testament record thicker set with striking incidents than this; and you will want to remember some ten or twelve items, at least, that are the promicent occurrences of this section. The time period on the scale is narrow, and all that you will find room for, will be a number and initials for each event. You must be careful to remember, as you write them, what each set of initials stands for.

- 14. You will now treat the book of Second Samuel, "The Reign of David," a forty-year period, in similar fashion.
- 15. After that, the first eleven chapters of First Kings, another forty-year period, covering "The Reign of Solomon." This last space for the forty years of Solomon's Reign should lie about half on either side of the thousand-year B. C. point on the scale of chronology.
- 16. And now we come to the most vexed part of the Old Testament history when the divided kingdom presents its confusion of records to the inspection of the student. This epoch is a little less than four hundred years ("-400" we will mark it in our table) and involves all that remains of the books of the Kings. The northern Kingdom, Israel, endured for two-thirds of this time, in round numbers 260 years, and the southern Kingdom, Judah, outlasted the northern in round numbers 130 years. To indicate this, start a line about three-quarters of an inch above the line of chronology at the close of the Reign of Solomon, and run it parallel with the line of chronology for a distance sufficient to represent the 260 years of the northern Kingdom. Divide the lower compartment into two sections, the upper for notes on the northern Kingdom, which should include at least the names of the most prominent kings, and the lower for the notes on the southern Kingdom, involving at least the names of the kings who are called "good kings." The upper Kingdom's notes will also contain what you wish to remember of the prophets, Elijah and Elisha.
- 17. We shall treat the two books of Chronicles as we have treated the collateral records, though they are really not of that class, but repeat in detail the history of the kingdom, prefaced by a genealogy and sketch of the early history of the nation. Because so much of it is a repetition we will write the names across the middle compartments which stand for the time of the kingdom from Saul on, and will run a long arrow back from the beginning of the words to the very beginning of human history.
- 18. We now come to a period known as "The Babylonian Captivity" (spoken of as of seventy years' duration, but which in reality lasted but about fifty years from the close of the records of "the Kings") for which we have no data in the books counted as the historical books. You will fill this fifty years' space by writing in the upper section in parenthesis (Daniel, I—VI.), under that, in parenthesis (70), and under that 50 for the time really left without historical record. In counting the seventy years of the Captivity, the Hebrews counted the last eighteen years when the monarchical administration was tottering to its final downfall. In the lower compartment you will annotate the first half of Daniel as suits you.

- 19. Complete your table of Old Testament history by marking off a hundred-year space for the books of "The Restoration," Ezra and Nehemiah. You will write Esther in the middle compartment of this epoch as collateral thereto, and divide the lower compartment into two sections, one for your mnemonic notes on Ezra and the other for those on Nehemiah.
- 20. There is left in your table a space representing four hundred years, which is the period preceding the coming of Christ for which there is no record that is accounted inspired. What we know of the period is gathered from Josephus, the books of the Maccabees, and from outside historians in scanty references. You might write these facts in the middle compartment of this section, if you choose, and such notes on the history of that time as seem most important in parentheses in the lower compartment and your table will be fairly finished.

If a company of from a half dozen to a dozen will do this work in weekly sections, (it naturally divides itself into eleven sections) comparing your individual results each week and spending the last two weeks in general review, I think no one of you will count the quarter as ill spent.

Alliance, O.

THE CHINESE ENIGMA.

BY WM. REMFRY HUNT.

Missionary in Ch'u Cheo District, China.

China has riveted the eyes of the civilized world. In the manner of her declaration of war against civilization, she has outclassed the most barbaric races. The position is an anomalous one. It is fraught with grave possibilities. The last great and hoary heathen colossus has dared to set the world back and isolate the nations. It is, however, too late in the day of human history for the world to exist "half savage and half civilized." In the last terrible and, we predict, final clash between the civilizations of the old and the new world, the issue is not in doubt.

The effect which the crisis has already had upon the relations of governments with each other is indicative of the fact that the functions of those governments in demanding protection and liberty for their nationals will be maintained. China has acted with almost unpardonable duplicity. Claiming supreme political power over the 18 provinces and the numerous dependencies, she has pleaded inability to suppress the secret societies or revolutionary clans.

The "Boxer" movement is not a new organization. Its history lies hid in the archives of Buddhistic and Taoistic priesthood. It has existed through the present Manchu dynasty. It is a religio-political rising. Favored and financed with imperial aid, the movement took on new impetus after the memorable reactionary movement in Pekin some two years since. It was in this coup d'etat that the bitter hatred and anti-foreign venom of the Empress Dowager was openly expressed.

The "Boxers" are a fanatical and murderous rabble. They are the militia of the Chinese. On their banners are inscribed the characters "Yih Ho Chuan," which in plain English means "United Volunteer Band." Being a corrupt government itself, the Chinese Court can but yield to the pressure brought to bear upon it by the secret societies who demand, under threat of rebellion, blackmail from the imperial treasury.

Prince Tuan mobilized these bloodthirsty and savage hordes. Their banners were unfurled all through Manchuria. The revolt spread like a prairie fire through Chili, Shansi and Shantung. Its aim was antiforeign, anti-modern, anti-government and anti-Christain. Under Prince Tuan, Kang Yih and Yung Lu, the revolution assumed portentous dimensions. The Prince took a diplomatic rush and proclaimed his puppet, Poo Chuin, as the de facto Emperor of the Chinese. Kwangsu had been forced to abdicate. The plot was laid, the dark scheme worked, and in less than three months all China, from Pekin to Hong Kong and from Shanghai to Szechuen, was in the throes of an unprecedented political and anarchical convulsion.

The astute Empress Dowager began to fear the movement had already transgressed its bounds. To attempt to stop it, however, would have been to turn its fury upon the palace. Tsze Hsi Ang had to not only sanction with imperial edicts the anti-foreign crusade, but to enrich with gold and commissariat the hordes of both Manchu "Boxer" and imperial troops.

The anti foreign edicts were sent far and wide by imperial courier. The vermilion pencil (Emperor-Usurper Tuan's decree) ordered the edicts to be rushed to every fu hien and small city in the provinces, at the express rate of 200 miles per diem. This was carried out. In three short months the provinces were swept clean of missionaries, miners, railway agents, telegraph offices, foreign naval and military schools and everything savoring of modern and scientific improvements.

During most of this time anarchy, rapine, pillage, disorder, and the general regime of insurrectionary devastation were laying waste the fairest and richest districts. It was in the provinces of Shansi, Chili and Honan that the missionaries suffered most. The fiendish atrocities (details of which are unfit for reiteration) perpetrated upon the highest and noblest womanhood of the century in the hellish frenzy of the demon-possessed ruffians, whose barbarous hate claimed in cold-blooded murder more than one hundred and sixty missionaries-not to mention thousands of native Christians, who are regarded as incendiaries-is a heinous crime against every canon of humanity and a tragic disavowal of international obligations.

The causes which lie at the base of the trouble, and which have with such scientific certainty produced the crisis, have had their origin, and still have their evolution from within the Imperial Court. It is so plain upon the tables. Facts are evidences. The Blue books will be a revelation. It will clear the air of the flimsy and flippant charge laid at the doors of missionary effort re the instigation and irritating of the outbreak.

China is responsible for her own break-up. She has demonstrated her inability for selfgovernment. The "open door" has been shut in the face of the world. The envoys, ministers and statesmen of the West have been treated with outrageous and murderous insults. Treaty rights have been trampled under foot, and missions hounded from her borders. The Mandarinate and highest officials connived at these unparalleled crimes, and in many cases aided and abetted the perpetrators of the same. At the heathen tribunal of Yu Hien, of Shansi, some sixteen American and British missionaries were de capitated and their bodies thrown outside the city walls to be devoured by the scavenger dogs. This is only one of the mildest of instances.

It seems as if the remaining fragments of the Pekin government must either choose the peaceful program of reform, or have its disturbing elements melted in the furnace of war. It looks as if there were no other alternative.

The allied armies are evacuating Pekin. Punitive expeditions plan to reach Pao ting fu and even Tai yuen fu. They may even waste and destroy the cities; but the lesson needed will not thus be taught or impressed upon the Chinese. Retribution may come from without, but reform, if it is to be reform, au permanence, must be inspired from within.

In this arena of an arrested civilization it is true that missions have contributed not a little to the upheaval. Missions sounded the bugle blast of reform! Missions educated the masses! Enlightenment of the millions meant revolutionary changes. The desire for emancipation from pagan servitude began to assert itself. Again, the wonderful awakening that has come to China in and through material avenues has had a peculiar and disturbing effect upon the foundations of Chinese life and society.

Into the compound of superstitions in the Chinese mind also have been forced the strangest innovations. The "foreign devil" came to stay. In asking the Chinese to forsake their ancestral customs, rites, idols, age-venerated creeds and dearest and cherished, though pagan, religious ceremonies, the missions have brought upon them the derision and fiercest hate of the priesthood whose craft is in danger.

This antagonism of civilization is the resultant creation of Western ideals and realizations. It is a demonstration of the problem of dynamics in the moral as well as the physical world. It is an illustration of the transforming life of a higher over a lower state. It stands as a protest against that quiescent inertia of the state, and without "Krupp guns" is ever winning new victories and achieving fresh successes. This is the program of missionics.

Christianity has quickened the industries of the East, enriched its variety, enlarged its volume and widened its markets. A recent writer on missions said: "Missionaries are the architects of a new civilization.' Another, a critic, wrote: "The missionaries deserve a vote of thanks from the commercial world. Every dollar put into the newly opened avenues means an enlarged return of profitable trade."

The great commercial agencies are not slow to recognize this. The Steam Navigation Company's agents on the Yangtse River, the China coasting trade and the Oriental and Occidental lines alike, take missionary passengers at rates of 20 per cent. discount on the ordinary charges.

Missions have, it is true, undermined and almost dethroned idolatry, but they are clean and free from the charge of instigating the uprising. The rising is among the people. This is a graver crisis than a mere conflict with a government. It is among the masses an insurrectionary movement, bo h antidynastic and anti-governmental. The real nature of the event is just dawning upon the minds of the Chinse masses.

It is a momentous politico protestant movement, in which four hundred millions of the human race are wildly struggling to throw off the bonds of servitude, the tyranny of illegal taxation, the terrors of officialdom, the demands of bribery, the corrupt injustice of the Yamen, the unmistakable greed of the Powers—after territorial expansion and annexation—these things have fanned the frenzy of the masses and unloosed the demons of pagan hate and produced the greatest collision of the century.

Current opinion comes to the conclusion that until the Chinese court is compelled by force to aid in restoring order, there will be no decided move on the part of the government or vicerojs to suppress the rebellion. Nor would it be a difficult thing for the insurrection to get utterly beyond China's power to suppress, even should it finally desire to do so.

At the great public meeting recently held in Shanghai, representing some twenty leading British, American, German and Swedish missions, some resolutions were framed and cabled home. They put the case in a nutshell. They are thus summarized:

- Causes of disorder and massacres anti-foreign and anti-progressive, aided by corrupt administration of Chinese officialdom. Agitate for reform.
- 2. Plot to exterminate foreigners, originated and favored by Prince Tuan, Dowager Empress and highest Manchu officials and Chinese governors. Secure justice.
- 3. No settlement can be satisfactory or lasting which is not thorough, and which does not secure alike the legitimate interests of Western nations and the real good of the Chinese people. Premature peace will be disastrous.
- 4. Following the settlement there should be a universal proclamation of its terms throughout every city and province in the empire, and that not only by mere edicts, but by such acts as will leave no doubt of its reality in the minds of the Chinese masses. Settlement must be thorough if it is to be permanent.

The situation, and the probable outcome of it, is very forcibly stated in a recent issue of the New York Journal of Commerce. It says: "The right of occupancy of the earth rests at bottom upon the use made of it, and the people who do not properly or adequately use the earth must give way to those who will, and the people who will not form a government must yield to the people who can form a government or have one ready to establish. . . . The whole world has now grown together so closely that it can no longer exist half civilized and half savage. As to the savages who profess nothing that we recognize as a government, we know how to deal with them; we establish governments over them. With the savages who profess to possess a civilization, and who have a government which appears to go through all the motions of a supreme political power, the problem is not quite so simple, but it is essentially the same. They have got to establish a civilized government over themselves or have one established over them."

WHAT SHOULD BE THE SCOPE OF THE BENEVOLENT ASSO-CIATION OF THE CHRIS-TIAN CHURCHES?*

CARLOS C. ROWLISON.

The primary object of the Church as an organization is not to feed the hungry, nor to nurse and heal the sick, nor to educate the ignorant, nor even to champion social reforms. Its primary object is to reveal the nature of God and to induce men to live Godlike lives. It once built hospitals; but it has found it possible to have many more and much better hospitals by inspiring men as citizens to build them. It once provided for the education of a community; but this is much better done now by those who, filled with the divine impulse to dispel the darkness of ignorance, have developed an educational system independent of the Church. Hence in general it may be said that, while the Church furnishes the ESSENTIAL MOTIVE for every form of benevolence, yet its duty as an institution in the community is not to build up and superintend all manner of eleamosynary and educational organizations. Yet should there be any important reform or benevolence which no other institution can foster or perfect, it is clearly the Church's duty to undertake it. Thus she champions the overthrow of the liquor traffic: thus she provides for helpless men, women and children; thus she organizes and supports social settlements. So far as it is possible to turn over such enterprises to other institutions, the Church should do so.

Is there any room for an association within the Church whose end must ALWAYS be for benevolences? Certainly there is. For the Church has, and always will have, those who in a peculiar way are dependent upon her, as they are upon no other institution. These are those who have undertaken as their life-work the service of the Church, or those who are dependent upon these servants of the Church, and those who, for other peculiar reasons, have a natural claim upon the Church such as they have upon no other institution. Therefore, the scope of a Church's benevolence is:

1. To provide for the support of its ministry-whether it is still active, or is retired by age or infirmity.

2. To provide for those who are dependent upon this ministry.

3. To care for the helpless WHO CAN BE REDEEMED by this care.

These are self-evident propositions, and in so far as they are not otherwise provided for they cover the scope of such an association as is gathered here to-day. Let us consider each item so rewhat in detail.

1. To provide for the support of its ministry-IF RETIRED BY AGE OR OTHER IN-FIRMITY. The ministry is not entered for the purpose of making a living. It is not a money making office. And while it is worth to a community all the money it costs to sustain it, yet it is supported, and properly, by the benevolences of the people over whom the ministry is exercised. It is only the extension of the principle which gives the pastor a stipulated salary that also provides a fund for the support of the disabled minister who is in need of such benevolence. This is so evident that I shall not argue it. The same principle may easily be applied to the support of indigent men and women who, for som- reason, have failed to make provision for the weakness of age or other infirmity, yet who have been specially devoted to the Church. Many a man not a minister has, by his untiring efforts and sacrifices, brought the Church to victory, who ought to be ministered to by the Church in the time of its prosperity and his indigence. With our present form of organization, most of this peculiar relief is committed to the Board of Ministerial Relief.

2. To impress the truth of my second proposition, it needs only re-statement. It is the duty of the Church to provide for those who are dependent upon her ministry for their livelihood. Helpless children, dependent parents, or o her unfortunates, must be cared for.

3. In the third place, it is the Church's duty to care for the helpless who by THIS CARE MAY BE REDEEMED. This function of the Benevolent Association is essentially missionary. No missionary enterprise is more fruitful. Here are the children of poor and friendless parents who have died while their children are helpless; how shall they be provided for? By the state, which says that no child shall be allowed to starve or to go naked, but whose motive can scarcely be higher; or by the Church, whose motive is that they must not only be fed and clothed, but, above all else, that they must be taught of God and disciplined in love, and have supplied to them as far as may be that parental affection of which they have been robbed by disaster? Church has found many times that these misfortunes have been her opportunity in her effort to save the rising generation from the sins of its parents. It is thus our foreign missionaries are led to open orphanages and accept famine as a divine opportunity. It is thus that the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church has opened its Orphans' Home, and sought to find hungry parental hearts to adopt the homeless little ones. It should, therefore, be clearly understood by the Church that this particular feature of the Benevolent Association is not merely an act of mercy, but is pre-eminently an act of good Church business in accomplishing the purpose for which it exists, namely, the redemption of the world. Since the Church has not been looking upon the care of the orphans and homeless as a missionary enterprise so much as an act of mercy toward the helpless, I wish to emphasize more fully the importance of this attitude toward the work. It is sometimes argued that the fact that an asylum is provided for the offspring has loosened for, many, the social rule of chastity. It is doubtful if there is much truth in this objection. If there are more illegitimate children than formerly, the causes lie much deeper in our social organizations and beliefs, and such an excuse as this is only a make-shift. Assuming then that natural parents will continue to cast off illegitimate children for some one else to care for, is it not an act of the highest importance for the redemption of society and for the salvation of individual souls that these children be surrounded from their infancy with holy Chris ian influences, and, if possible, be adopted by loving hearts into holy families? You and I, who have lived in the atmosphere of Christian restraint and discipline all our lives, still feel that our children must be brought up with the utmost care. If this is true of such children, how much more do these who have in them the inherited tendencies to evil, the bad blood of decased parentage, and are shamed from their infancy with the taint of illegitimacy, need the most watchful care and the protection of loving hearts. A great doctrine of our day is popularly stated: "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure"-"formation, not re-formation." that the child must be helped to grow naturally into a pure, true man, rather than to make him over after he has undermined his physical health and destroyed his moral vigor in vice and sin. And so a hundred dollars spent in caring for the orphan children in the day of their dependency is worth more, as an evangelizing enterprise, than several times that much in rescue mission work and city evangel zation.

If this is true regarding the work which we should do for illegitimate children, how much more should we care for the children of poor but honorable parents who by disease and death are left homeless in the world. If they are left to drift without protection and constraint, many of them will die an untimely death and those who survive only too often fall far below the plane of life to which their parents had risen.

One thing, therefore, to be included in the scope of our Benevolent Association is surely its phase as a missionary enterprise.

Indeed, in advocating the necessity for such an association, much more emphasis should be put upon this characteristic of i's work. To keep a little body from hunger or cold is an act of mercy, but to act solely from this motive is to treat a child as though it were merely an animal. Even dogs may have cold bodies and hungry stomachs. Poor poodle, how he shivers! Isn't it awful? No, it isn't awful. If the wretched whelp could but get out and earn his living as he was created to do he would be warm enough. The mere hunger and cold of a child, though important, are decidedly minor matters. To starve its soul by neglect, to permit it to grow up ignorant and undisciplined in an age streaming with light and knowledge, is a reproach to us. To let that boy remain in the vicious atmosphere and vile society of the slums, a terror to society and a soul damned from its infancy, when he might breathe the pure air of the farm and sit by the hearthstone of a loving Christian family and become a protection to society and an undying son of God, is a disgrace to Christianity, and one of the first duties of the church is to rescue him from his surroundings.

One thing the Benevolent Association is doing, and must do more and more, is to provide homes for homeless children among the cultured and prosperous. We send missionaries to China and Porto Rico and we send out our state evangelists, and this is all well. But when God undertook to save the world he did not hire some one to do it for him,-he came in the person of his Son and by infinite sacrifice and personal service saved the lost. So also must we do. And there are thousands of Christian homes represented at this convention which are spoiling with narrowness and selfishness, that God is calling to open their doors to give light and happiness and redemption to these homeless children.

The gift without the giver is bare. Who gives himself with his alms, feeds three, Himself, his hungering neighbor, and Me.

It must therefore be more and more the work of the Benevolent Association to hunt out these empty homes and to fill them with the patter of little feet, with the prattle of little lips, with the love of children's hearts. What is more desolate than a childless home? Nothing but an orphan's heart. Our beloved Association must lend a mighty influence for the dissipation of this desolation by placing many more parentless children in childless homes.

The Benevolent Association has made a remarkable record during the few years of its existence. Its experience has taught it pretty clearly what the scope of its work is When it controls homes for aged to be. preachers and their families, together with other feeble Disciples, when it has Orphans' Homes in all the states where we are strongest, and an efficient corps of workers connected with each who shall be placing constantly homeless children in childless homes, it will then be equipped to do the work which a great religious people ought to do for those dependent on them, and will also become one of the most effective of our missionary enterprises. That the churches and pastors of the country heartily and enthusiastically support this association is certainly the very least that we can expect from them.

Indianapolis, Ind., Oct. 9, 1900.

Our Budget.

- -National election next week.
- -But do not let this little matter interfere with your annual offering for State Missions.
- -November is the month set apart for the offering for State Missions, beginning with the first Lord's day.
- -A number of good churches have neglected the offering for State Missions, to the serious detriment of every department of our missionary work. This ought not so to be.
- -If any church feels itself so exhausted by the election that it is unable to attend to this offering on the first Lord's day, let it fix upon some later day in November in order to press this matter upon the minds of its members.
- -St. Louis just now is experiencing a revival of interest in all the churches. W. E. Harlow's meeting at the Fourth Church has resulted in fiftytwo additions to date, mostly by confession, and will continue over next Lord's day. The community is profoundly stirred. The meeting of S. D. Dutcher with the Compton Heights congregation is also progressing well, but we have not learned the number of additions up to date. The other churches are having increased audiences, enlarged Sunday schools and an awakened interest.
- -One hundred Thanksgiving dinners for the poor will be provided by the Christian Endeavorers of St. Paul, Minn. The suggestion comes in time to be adopted by many elsewhere. An Endeavor can't be in better business than carrying happiness to the poor and afflicted.
- The Disciples Club of New York holds monthly meeting during the fall, winter and spring and an annual dinner in place of the March meeting. Their list of speakers includes names of many to whose utterances the thinking world listens with respect: Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth, Rev. F. D Power, Edwin Markham, Rev. Peter Ainslie, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Rev. W. J. Wright.
- -Remember that the offering to be made on the Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America is to be divided among the different departments of our Home Missionary work: Church Extension, the general evangelization of America, and the mission board of your own state.
- -The rains have fallen in India, but it must not therefore be assumed that the famine is over or the need of relief past. The rain is a promise of a ha vest. But mean while people cannot be fed and clothed by a promise which does not ma ture for some months. In 1877, when India was swept by a great famine, the number of deaths for the year was five and a quarter millions more than the ordinary death rate and there were fewer births than usual by two million. That famine therefore reduced the population of India by seven millions. The famine of 1897 was worse, and that of 1900 was still worse. A populati n of ninety million is affected by the present famine, or fifty per cent. more than in '77 or '97. The British government has done much in relief, and private charity has done much, but aid is still needed until the crops which are now being planted can mature.
- -The call to the preachers of Indiana in behalf of "The Twentieth Century Movement" in that state, which will be found elsewhere, is one that will be sure to attract the attention of our Indiana preachers. The movement is one that promises great good for the cause of that state, and the success of the work in one state means the benefit of the cause in every other state. We will watch with interest this movement in Indiana.

- -The article entitled "How to Study the Historical Books of the Old Testament." by A. M. Chamberlain, is the fourth in the series of supplementary readings in the Bethany Reading Course. It is still not too late to take up the work of the reading course for this quarter. J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, O., will tell you all about it.
- -If any one of our readers has a copy of The Independent (New York) of Jan. 4, 1900, and will send it to B. B Tyler, 1042 Logan Ave., Denver, Col., he will confer a favor.
- -W. Remfry Hunt, whose article on "The Chinese Enigma" will be found among our contributed articles, is well-known to our readers as a missionary of long experience in China and as the author of the important little volume, "Facts About China." Mr. Hunt writes to us from Shanghai under date of Sept. 20:
- "We are still refugees in Shanghai. The crisis is at its height. The danger is not yet past. The Yangtse Valley is bordering on anarchy."
- -Last Lord's day St. Louis was favored with an unusually large number of visiting preachers. A. C. Smither, of Los Angeles, Cal., occupied the pulpit of Mt. Cabanne Church, morning and evening, preaching to large and interested audiences. He and his wife were on their way back from Kentucky, whither they went to visit friends after the National Convention, to their home on the Coast. F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, having some engagements to lecture in Southeast Missouri, spent Lord's day in the city, worshiping with the Central Church in the morning and preaching for it at night. Needless to say, the church and his many friends were delighted to hear him once more. He was also accompanied by his wife. Bro. Kersey, president of Bethany College, who has been spending several days in the city, worshiped with the Central on Lord's day morning and evening, where he also addressed the prayer-meeting on Wednesday evening preceding. D. R. Daugan, of Canton, was also present in the city, having been called to preach at the funeral of one of the members of the Mount Cabanne Church. These, with the two visiting brethren mentioned holding protracted meetings, made quite an addition to our preaching force in the city. We had a delightful meeting of these visiting brathren with our pastors at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST on Monday morning, and after the usual reports stirring talks were made by Brethren Smither, Tyrrell, Kersey, Harlow and Dungan. The se brethren all spoke words of hopefulness and cheer concerning the progress of the work in th ir various fields of labor.
- -The Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America is the first offering that will be reported in the new century. It ought to be a great offering. With such a plea as we have our home missionary work ought to be in the very forefront, and to this end our National Convention at Kansa. City passed the following resolution:
- "We recommend that Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America be especially emphasized, and that all possible efforts be made that the receipts of this day may soon be as large as the receipts of Childr n's Day for Foreign Missions.

We urge every school that has not ordered supplies for this great day to order at once from Benj L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio. The day should be made a glad day in all our schools, appealing to the sentiment of patriotism and to the sentiment of thanksgiving, and should be made a rall, day for the winter campaign. No wise superintendent will neglect this splendid opportunity of helping his school and at the same time helping forward the good work of Home Missions. We heartily commend it.

- -J. L. Newcomer, of Hagerstown, Md., has written a tract on "How to Get Rid of the Saloon." His contention is that we shall never overthrow the saloon as long as we have government by party, and that "before anything can be done in the direction of destroying the saloon, the government by party must be done away with and government by the people established." The remedy he proposes is that of direct legislation. He does not believe, however, that the adoption of direct legislation would immediately result in the destruction of the saloon. "All we claim for direct legislation on the liquor question is that it would make possible the de truction of the saloon whenever the people desired its destruction. This is at present impossible. No matter how much the people may desire the destruction of the saloon, they have no more power to accomplish its destruction than they have to regulate the laws of Russia. Direct legislation would give the power to the people and thus make possible what is now impossible." Those who wish to read further literature on this subject can secure the tract above mentioned and other literature by addressing R. S. Thompson, Springfield, O

The above appeal is made "for the purpose of awakening the sympathies of the American people, and further app aling to their bountiful instlucts to rescue these sufferers from the hardships still confronting them." The CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST hopes that this appeal to the American people will be generously responded to, so that there shall be no unnecessary suffering on the part of the unfortunate victims of the Galveston hurricane and

-The following dispatch from the Globe-Democrat of St. Louis, will carry sad news to many, both in and out of Indiana.

Rev. Henry Russell Pritchard, the oldest Christian minister in the United States died suddenly at Chesterfield, Ind Mr. Pritchard was born near Georgetown, Ky., in January, 1819. In 1829 he moved to Newcort, Ky., where he remained until he was 21 years of age He united with the Mathodist Church when a young man, and remained a member until 1840, when he became a member of the Christian Church. He had lived in Indiana since 1854. He was the intimate associate of Alexander Campbell and learned many principles of the faith that he preached for more than half a century from its founder.

-Apropos of the University of New York's all of Fame, the niches of which are to be partly led in accordance with a recent vote of a jury eminent men, some reflections occur to us. ey may not be startlingly original, but they are ggested very vividly by this list of the truly eat. First, not all famous men are great. me is often a mere gift. At least the ability become famous not infrequently occurs inpendently of ability to do anything else of uch consequence. Ability to become famous sy constitute a certain sort of greatness; but, ken by itself, it isn't worth the marble bust hich keeps it famous. Whether there is such thing as luck or not, many men owe their fame circumstances over which they have no control, ther than to their greatness. Second, not all reat men are famous. As the ability to become mous may exist unsupported by much merit of ther sorts, so a man may be great in almost very respect except in the faculty of getting imself talked about. Third, not all men who re supposed to be both great and famous are eally well known to the general public. Probably ew, even among well informed people, read arough the list of the famous, as decided by the iry, without stopping once or more to ask themelves, who was this or that man?

-We have received a clipping from the Atlanta onstitution of the 2d ult., containing an article Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay, entitled "Jefferon's First Successor at Monticello." It is a reply to narticle which appeared some time ago in a New ork magazine on "The Home of Jefferson," in bich it was stated that Dr. Barclay, who purhased Monticello and became its first accupant fter Jefferson's death, being a "bitter political nemy of the dead president," had "vindictively ut down all the trees Jefferson had planted with uch great care," etc. The article of Mrs. Barclay, esides showing the utter falsity of this state ent, contains an interesting historical sketch of he Barclay family in Ireland and since their reloval to this country. It shows that our first nissionary to Jerusalem, Dr. James T. Barclay, ad descended from an eminent family, whose rep esentatives had held very responsible positions oth in the old and the new world. The article tates that "when Dr. and Mrs. Barclay took posseslon of Monticello, the house was furnished just s Mr. Jefferson had left it. They found in the reat man's bed-chamber his table and books in ndistarbed position, his lamp upon the table, and herbarium filled with rare flowers and his own ron bedstead immovably attached to the wall." he article further states that "the venerable, rhite-haired, sweet-faced, gentle old lady, the wife of D. James T. Barclay, and first mistress of Monticello, after the death of the illustrious Jef ferson, who is in full possession of her mental faculties," is the authority of the writer for the facts stated in her article, and "for the assurance that Dr. Barclay never cut down a tree at Monticello that Mr. Jefferson had planted, or that was rare, or of any value whatever, but he himself planted many trees on the 'little mountain' which he loved as he had always loved and admired the memory of its former owner." The article states further that "soon after leaving Monticello, Dr. Barclay was possessed with a strong desire to go as a missionary to China under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board of Missions, and his wife, Mrs. Barclay, was also so imbued with the missionary spirit that she sent all of her jewels to Dr Converse of Richmond, to be sold for the missionary cause." Circumstances prevented his going, at that time, and later, as is well known, he became the first missionary sent by the Disciples of Christ to any foreign field. He was sent to Jerusalem, where he remained a number of years, made val uable discoveries, and wrote the book so widely known, entitled, "The City of the Great King."

—The following statement, made by W. E. Curtis in a recent number of the Chicago Record, is worthy of the very serious consideration of every American citizen.

Burke A. Hinsdale, Ph. D., LL. D.

Burke A. Hinsdale, son of Albert and Clarinda E. Hinsdale, was born March 31, 1837, in Wadsworth, Ohio, and, like most of the successful educators of the country, commenced at the bottom round of the academic ladder. Professor Hinsdale began teaching in a district school in Summit County of his native State; afterwards he became principal of an academy, President of Hiram College from 1870 to 1882, Superintendent of Cleveland Public Schools from 1882 to 1886, and then Professor of the Science and the Art of Teaching in the University of Michigan in 1888, the duties of which office he continues to discharge with marked ability. Professor Hinsdale has had conferred upon him by Bethany and Williams Colleges the degree of A. M., by Ohio State University the degree of Ph. D., and by the Ohio University the degree of LL. D. He is a member of the National Educational Association, the National Council of Education, and the Michiigan State Teachers' Association and Schoolmasters' Club. For the year 1897 he was President of the Council, and has served as president of some of the other departments for the N. E. A. He is now President of the Michigan State Teachers' Association. He was also a member of the Committee of Twelve on Rural Schools and of the Committee on College Entrance Requirements. Besides his own chosen field of education, he has also cultivated with much thoroughness parts of

Nothing Tastes Good

And eating is simply perfunctory—done because it must be.

This is the common complaint of the dyspeptic.

If eating sparingly would cure dyspepsia, few would suffer from it long.

The only way to cure dyspepsia, which is difficult digestion, is to give vigor and tone to the stomach and the whole digestive system.

Hood's Sarsaparilla cured the niece of Frank Fay, 106 N. St., South Boston, Mass., who writes that she had been a great sufferer from dyspepsia for six years; had been without appetite and had been troubled with sour stomach and headache. She had tried many other medicines in vain. Two bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla made her well.

the field of American history; he is a member of the American Historical Association, the Historical and Archæological Society of Ohio, and an Honorary Member of the Historical Society of Virginia, has also served as president of various educational and religious societies. For many years Professor Hinsdals carried on in Ohio a religious ministry in connection with his regular educational work, served as an assistant or contributing editor of various periodicals, and has had a large experience as a lecturer on educational, religious, moral, political, literary, and other subjects. He has contributed extensively to the pamphlet literature of the country. Partial lists of Professor Binsdale's historical articles and pamphl to may be found in the annual reports of the Historical Association, especially for the year 1889. His earliest books were on religious subjects. His best known books are "President Garfield and Education," "Schools and Studies," "The Old Northwest," "The American Government," "How to Study and Teach History," "Teaching the Language-Arts," "Jesus as a Teacher," "Studies in Education," "The History and Civil Government of Ocio," (in connection with his daughter, Mary L. Hinsdale), and "The Art of Study" Professor Hinsdale edited President Garfield's Works, two volumes. President Angell has endorsed "The Old Northwest" as one of the most useful, exhaustive, and scholarly works upon the subject ever given to the public, and Judge T. M. Cooley "The American Government" as very carefully prepared by one who is master of the subject. Professor Moses Coit Tyler expresses himself as being the debtor to the author of "How to Study and Teach History" in a high degree All of the works mentioned have been strongly commended by the m st competent authorities. Prof. Hinsdale is most happy in his marital relations and has a family of three daughters. An elaborate history of the University of Michigan by him will soon be in the press. It belongs to the great series called 'Universities and their Sons.'

Alexander Campbell's Theology, by W. E. Garrison, the most recent book issued by the Christian Publishing Company, is already receiving high commendation from many of our leading men and best thinkers. It is a handsome volume of 302 pages, worthy in every respect a place in the library of every preacher and thinking Disciple. Price. $1.00. Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis.

Personal Mention.

Sumner T. Martin will begin a meeting with Howard Cramblett at South Omahs, Neb., Nov. 11.

Dr. W. T. Moore will begin a meeting for C. S. Brooks, at New London, Mo., Nov. 11.

- J. D. Johnson, of Canton, O., informs us that Bro. Updike will begin a meeting with his church
- I. N. Grisso will soon close his work with the First Church at La Porte, Ind. He may be corresponded with at that address.

George P. Taubman, pastor of the church at Portsmouth, O., is again in his pulpit after a period of enforced idleness on account of sickness.

In the list of bequests to Church Extension in our issue of Oct. 18, the name of Marcie Waughs, $300, should be Marcie Waughop, Henry, Ill.

D. L. Dunkleberger closes his work at Marion, Ia., but says that the church does not want to correspond with preachers at present.

Clyde C. Callahan has accepted a call to Greenfield, O., where he is already at work. The church is now in its new building and the outlook is bright.

- S. W. Crutcher would like to hold a meeting in November or December, and will engage one Sunday a month for 1901 with some church not too far from Harrisonville, Mo.
- B. H. Crossfield, of Owensboro, Ky., has a lecture on "Six Pilgrim Parsons in Palestine," which is highly recommended for brilliant description and humorous narrative.

Prof. John Joyce, singing evangelist, of Athens, Ohio, will assist J. J. Higgs in a meeting at Onarga, Ill., beginning Nov. 11th. After close of this meeting he is free to engage for the balance of the winter. Write him at Athens, Ohio, Mrs. E. J. Lampton, of Louisiana, Mo., former president of the C. W. B. M. in Missouri, was taken dangerously ill on her return from the National Convention in Kansas City. She is now improving.

S. S. McGill has closed two years of successful work at Kingman, Kan., and will enter the evangelistic field after Nov. 11. Churches desiring his services may address him at Kingman. M. B. Ingle will take the church at Kingman.

Cal Ogburn has been nominated on the prohibition ticket for delegate to Congress from Arizona, but has declined in order to carry out his plan of doing evangelistic work in the east. His first meeting will be at Madrid, Ia.

I. N. McCash, of the University Place Church, Des Moines, who has been dangerously ill with typhoid in a London hospital, is reported by cablegram to be improving. The last message received by his wife reads: "Fever broken; very much better."

Paul H. Castle has resigned his work at Virden, Ill, to take effect Jan. 1., and will be ready at that time to enter another field. During his pastorate of a year and a half the church has grown from 125 to 200. The church has in view a good man to succeed Bro. Castle.

Albert Buxton, of Hillsboro, Tex., reports that he has recently had a "double ministry" in each of three families: a wedding and the burial of the bridegroom within a week, the burial of a father and child within a month, and the burial of a son and baptism of the father within a fortnight.

The church at Greeley, Is., has extended to D. H. Bays a unanimous call to remain another year at an incre-sed salary. Many outside of the church have volunteered to contribute to the salary—a very substantial token of their interest. Lawrence Wright will soon begin a meeting there.

Jeu Hawk writes us from Portland under date of October 20th that he intends to sail, November 3, for Hong Kong, China, by way of Vancouver, B. C., on the steamer "Empress of Japan." He expects to practice medicine for the support of himself and family, conduct a free clinic for the poor, and to preach the primitive gospel of Christ to those who come for treatment and whenever he can obtain a tearing. Bro. Jeu has proved himself a man of integrity, Christian character and ability, and we wish him success in his new field of labor, in helping to make that New China which is to be.

F. D. Power, paster of Vermont Ave. Christian Church, Washington, D. C., recently delivered his twenty fifth anniversary sermon, recounting some of the scenes and experiences in the life of the of the scenes and experiences in the life? the nation and of the church within that period. "Nowhere on earth," he said, "does one seem to get so old in so short a time as in Washington." He began his ministry there in 1875 when General Grant was in the middle of his second term. He and the famous men associated with him at the close of the war passed in procession, and then close of the war passed in procession, and after came President Hayes and his cabinet, and after that Garfield, with the tragic scenes associated with his brief administration, then Arthur and his following appeared upon the scene. Of the Forty-s venth Congress, of which Brother Power was chaplain, but five remain on the roll of the House, out of 325. Then came President Cleve land, and the changes which his administration brought in Washington life. Cleveland was fellowed by Harrison and Harrison in turn again by Cleveland, and then came Mr. McKinley and four years of remarkable history in our national life. While Washington has almost doubled its population in that period, the congregation has quadrupled its membership in this quarter of a century, while the membership in the city has increased twelvefold. "From one church we have grown to four and from 150 to a membership of 1,800. this church 1,346 have been added and $200,000 has been contributed to the Lord's work. Seven thousand, five hundred services have been beld; the pastor has preached 4,000 sermons, and made 35,000 visits." May the honored pastor live yet many years to be the faithful leader of our forces in the national capital.

American Bible Society and the Revised Version

A good many of us would like to see the American Bible Society issue the Bible in the Revised Version. I understand the Constitution of the Bible Society forbids the issue of any version other than the King James. If this is so, would it not be wise, in this session, to pass a resolution suggesting a proper change of the Constitution, so that this great Society may circulate the New Version? SUMNER T. MARTIN.

[The foregoing note was handed to us at the National Convention at Kansas City, but there was no opportunity at that time to bring it before the Committee on Resolutions. We desire, however, to say that if there be a provision in the Constitution of the American Bible Society which prevents it from issuing any other version of the Bible than that of King James, it should undoubtedly be changed. This is conservatism gone to The Revised Version has now been before the Christian public for sixteen years and its superiority over the King James Version is attested by the scholarship of the world. Why, then, should the American Bible Society continue to publish exclusively an inferior version when it has a superior one at its disposal? There should be pressure brought to bear on the Society in some way to effect the necessary change in its Con-stitution to enable it to issue the Revised Version, and better still, the Revised Version with "the readings and renderings preferred by the American Committee."—EDITOR.]

Twentieth Century Movement.

CALL TO THE PREACHERS OF INDIANA.

DEAR BRETHREN:-We are at the very door of he Twentieth Christian Century. We are concious of great victories for righteousness in the past. We remember the wonderful advancement of the century just closing. And yet we are nindful that the spirit of the Master is by no neans the all-pervading influence in the world. Figantic evils have entrenched themselves. Maerialism engrosses the hearts of the people. The ense of the presence of God has been lost even o many of those who are in the churches. Too ften indeed the ministry has shown a spirit of rivalry and worldly ambition that has dishonored our Lord. In our own state the evangelization of the isolated districts is very largely neglected. The churches are doing but little to educate and squip a thoroughly qualified ministry. There is not a united movement of the Lord's army for the redemption of all the waste places of our be-

Still, it seems to us that we are on the eve of a great religious awakening. While our churches are not actively co-operating as they should do, nevertheless they are at peace with themselves, and, under a strong ministry, have themselves become strong. The ministry of the state is congenial and is ready for a united movement. We are all conscious of our shortcomings; we are all eager for a deeper consciousness of the presence of God; we are all anxious to move our forces as one army that we may convince the world that Christ is sent of God.

Assured that you will cheerfully assist in any plans for advancement, we most heartily invite you, with all the ministers and churches of the state, to join us in a Twentieth Century Movement for the furtherance of our Master's kingdom in Indiana. There is great need for a united effort to evangelize the neglected parts of our state; a crying need is the complete and effective organization of our state forces; a great opportunity is offered, and a widespread demand is upon us, to make strenuous endeavors toward the equipment of an institution to prepare men for the Christian ministry. Surely these are occasions enough to demand a united movement.

We believe that this Movement should begin with a gathering of the ministers of the state for Prayer and Conference, that by w ling our hearts together in the fires of a common meeting for consecration and counsel the Lord may the mary effectual v work through us. Being intensely convinced that such a meeting is essential, we have the efore determined to call together the preachers of the state. It is sincerely hoped that every one will respond.

We have thought November 20, 21, an opportune time for holding such a meeting, and Indianapolis the most accessible place for all. Free enter tainment will be provided for all visiting preach ers. The first session will be held at the Central Christian Church, Delaware and Walnut Streets, Tuesday, Nov. 20, at 2:30 P. M. Let every one be present to join in the very first song and prayer. When you decide to attend, please drop a card to Carlos C. Rowlison, 707 E. Thirtsenth St., Indianapolis, that entertainment may be provided.

This call is sent out by the unanimous vote of the Christian Ministers' Association of Indianapolis, and by the following brethren who have authorized their names attached to it: A. J. Frank, Columbus; Ira Billman, Evansville; O. E. Palmer, New Albany; E. A. Cantrell, Washington; L. E. Sellers, Terre Haute; W. J. Russell, Rushville; P. J. Rice, South Bend; W. D. Starr, Noblesville; E. L. Frazier, Marion; J. O. Rose, Lebanon; E. Finley Mahan, Shelbyville; Chas. S. Medbucy, Angola; J. F. Floyd, Kokomo; T. J. Clark, Bloomington; Wallace Tharp, Crawfordaville; J. H. McNeill, Muncie; Geo. Darsie, Jr., Connersville; W. T. Groom, Wabash.

Philadelphia Ministerial Association.

The pastors of the Christian churches of Philadelphia met at the home of the undersigned Monday morning, Oct. 22, 1900, and effected the organization of a ministerial association of the Disc ples. G. P. Rutledge, pastor of the Third Christian Church, W. Phil., was chosen as presiding officer of the association, and R. A. Smith, paster Kensington Christian Church, secretary. The meetings of the association will be held at 10 A. M., Mondays, at the Central Y. M. C. A. Building, corner 15th and Chestnut Sts. Brethren visiting in Philadelphia or passing through the city at that time are most cordially invited to attend these R. A. SMITH.

"Footsteps of the Pioneers."

With good taste and great care and at consid erable expense, Bro. C. C. Redgrave, of Maroa, Ill., has gotten up a stereopticon lecture on the "Footsteps of the Pioneers," setting forth the rise and progress of the churches of Christin America. We have been having him among some of our churches in this section and it arouses great enthusiasm. There is nothing like it and its educational benefits are incalcu able.

In the opinion of the writer, we need in all our churches a revival of first principles.

IN THE THROES OF AN ELECTION.

Here we in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland are once more flung into the crucible of a general election. As I write we are in the very midst of the conflict at the polls. Many of the readers of this letter may have been born in the Old Country and will have a lively recollection of the doings throughout this land during a political election, but nobody who has not seen England can form an idea of the meaning of such a time without some explanation. In America you make all the elections throughout the land on one day and you shut the saloons. On the contrary, with us the old systems prevail. The polling lasts several weeks. Some places vote on one day and all the returns for that day come before the public next morning, creating a mixture of surprise, excitement, delight and disappointment. Some are dancing with delight that oozes out of their toes because words fail to express their gratification. Others hang down their faces in disgust. All the public-houses, as we call the saloons, are open, and they are just so many dens of devilry. Drinking is accelerated and disorders are provoked. For about a month this goes on through the country. Here then is one of those matters of vital national interest in which our reformers plead for a vast alteration by the adoption of the American system. To that we shall have to come. At the same time I must beg my kind American readers not to imagine that I intend by this frank exposure to intimate that America has all the advantage in electoral arrangements. We have much less political corruption here than you are afflicted with. Our troubles are rather social than political. Yours are political rather than social, as far as I can understand. Wonderful purgation has taken place in our public life. What we want is reform of the old abuses in the electioneering details. It is our astonishing conservatism which keeps up a lot of silly time-honored anomalies. On the other hand in political ethics we are in advance of you. Therefore each of these two great nations has something to learn from the other.

THE PARTY PROSPECTS.

By the time the letter appears the crisis will he over and the immediate issues will be settled. I believe that the Tory Government which has appealed to the country will remain in power, but with a much reduced majority. The British people are almost universally convinced that the Boer war was rendered inevitable by the Boers themselves, and that the conflict was forced on England. I myself became convinced of that, though unwillingly, as I was a determined friend to the Boers. I learned that they were all in the wrong, and have not hesitated to declare honestly what I painfully learned. This is the national state of miad also. Well, I only make this allusion to the matter because it explains the way the tide is rolling in the election. On the morning when I am writing these lines the returns show that the Liberals have slightly gained, and that the current of opinion is turning against the Tories. This was sure to be the case, because it is felt by all classes and parties that though the Government could not prevent the war, they should have shown more wise prevision and have made more careful provision. Through their lack of foresight thousands of precious lives have been lost. Again, there are future issues which are casting their shadows beforehand at this juncture. We are to have many a struggle in Parliament about religious adjustments between Church and State. There is a fierce current of indignation against ritualism.

The High Church clergy have gone too far towards Rome to be able to retreat without shame and humiliation, and High Churchmen are very arrogant and proud. But it really does seem at last that the Evangelicals or Low Churchmen will not any longer submit to the domination of the ritualizing section. There is likely to be a tremendous ecclesiastical struggle of which all the world will hear with thrilling interest. Thousands of us here are longing and praying for the time when we shall witness the emancipation of the Church of England from the State thraldom. We want to see religion free, as it is in America. Here again you have set the pattern and so have all our colonies. But the vested interests involved are so complicated and so stupendous that we cannot expect disestablishment and disestablishment in a hurry. Then there will come a parliamentary war about the drink traffic. This will be simpler, but will be equally agitating. Selfishness will be even more profoundly excited. So there are hot times in store. England will not be at all a sleepy place to live in during the first years of the 20th century. You American friends will find plenty of interest in the affairs of Old England for many a year to come. And if I am spared to write these letters there will be some realistic romances of national life to record. I want to see the mutual interests of these two magnificent nations more and more developed. We are sister peoples. We shall need each other.

THE NEO-IMPERIALISM.

A new shade of party color is appearing The Liberals are winning some seats in this general election on a fresh plea, never enunciated in political programs before. Imperialism is the new watchword. Such men as Dr. Conan Doyle and Rudyard Kipling have done much by their stirring proclamations to promote the imperialistic feeling. I note in all the American papers which reach me that Imperialism is more and more affecting the American mind also. But there seems to be an important difference between American and English Imperialism. The English Imperialists are not Expansionists, but the American Imperialists are supposed to be identical with the Expansionists. Here the Imperialists are simply demanding the unity, the consolidation and strengthening of the empire. None of them advocate the addition of another square mile of territory. But they will hear of no paltering with secession. This is ex actly parallel with the position taken by the North against the South in the great American civil war. But you Imperialists are for expansion. Is it not so? I gather this from one paper after an-

OUR NEXT PRIME MINISTER.

It is not possible that Lord Salisbury can much longer be Premier. He is the most popular man in all the land. It is difficult to say why. The Queen likes him. The Lords like him. The Commons like him. The rich like him. The trading classes like him. The workingmen like him. The paupers in the workhouses like him. For years I have wondered why. In vain I have sought a reason. This acme of political popularity is a tremendous paradox. It is a problem in psychology. For Lord Salisbury is an ideal type of the arrogant and overbearing aristocrat. He has no sympathetic faculty. He jeered, at the Lord Mayor's banquet at the Mansion House, when he made his infamous speech about the Armenians, just as Lord Beaconsfield had done years before over the agonies of the Bulgarians. Lord Sallsbury holds the people in contempt. He flouts public opinion. He gibes and scoffs at free schools. He has a supreme contempt for the workingman. And now I think I have suggested the only solution. The public is not an ass. Far be it from me to pen the blaspbemy which I should perpetrate were I to insinuate such a thing about the English people. But I will go so far as to say that the great profanum vulgus is really very much like ; ass. I may speak of affinities and may predica verisimilitudes. Yes, an ass gets so used to beir kicked that at last it actually seems to enjoy th most brutal blows of the hobnailed boot and comes to relish the applications of the cudge Never has any Premier ventured on such constant demonstrations of contempt for the masses a Lord Salisbury has been guilty of. And homeekly the insulted masses have borne it all! have come to the conclusion that the popular co. lective mind is altogether subjectively distinc from the individual consciousness. What no on man would tolerate a million will delight to sub mit to. Public opinion is scorned by this big cor oneted cavalier. But his reign is happily draw ing to an end. He is growing too old and too in firm to bear the strain of our stirring times. And who will be his successor? My own opinion i that the life of the new Parliament will be ver short; that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain will play up for the succession to the Premiership, but tha the nation will not have him in the supreme office There will commence a strong reaction agains the Tory regine. Lord Rosebery will ere long in another general election come to the front as the favorite of the people and the leader of the Libera party. And when that happens he will be a kind o national idol in his turn. He will be the antagonis of "Brummagem Joe," and in comparison with Rosebery, Chamberlain will in the popular choice be nowhere.

TALMAGE'S DEPARTURE.

On Sunday afternoon I had the great delight of hearing Dr. Talmage's last sermon preached in England during this visit. He leaves Liverpool in the Oceanic, Oct. 17. I shall as long as I live remember that sermon, preached in Wesley's Chapel City Road. Surely, there is no more worderful master of cratorical magic living. At one time we were with the preacher up in celestial realms with the hierarchies and seraphs, and presently we had floated down and were in the slume of earthly woe, looking with tears in our eyes at the victims of vice and wickedness. Then we were joining in the rippling laughter that spread over the vast crowd like sunlight over the sea, as the marvelous rhetorician broke into flashes of wit. He played on all the potentialities of mental mood. I have put Talmage down in my category of the great preachers I have heard, and the great orators I bave heard outside the pulpit; and I class him with Spurgeon, Gladstone, John Gough, Beecher and Alexander Maclaren. These to my mind have been the greatest orators to whom I have listened with enchantment. Of continental speakers I would class with them the wonderful Italian, Padre Gavazzi. It seems to me that Talmage is now at his very best, for his fire and elequence are unabated and he has reinforced his style with the accumulations of incidents all drawn from his own personal experience. He told us nothing secondhand but was all the while speaking of the things he had seen and heard, tasted and handled, in the purview of his own life. WILLIAM DURBAN.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

The most interesting news within the last few days is the intelligence from the General Convention of Disciples of Christ in Kansas City. You did not see me at the convention, but I was present in spirit every day and every hour. Kansas City was the most interesting place on earth to me at the time indicated. How eagerly every item of news has been jotted down. With what delight every indication of progress has been noted. The time was when good men objected to speaking of the Disciples of Christ as "a movement." That day is passed. If we are not "a movement" what are we? We are moving in the right direction and with as great celerity as is safe.

The value of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions cannot be estimated in dollars. Its chief value is spiritual. This Board was organized in part to disseminate missionary intelligence and to develop a missionary spirit. This purpose is kept steadi'y in view. At the time of its organization, twenty-six years ago, these were among our greatest needs. The need exists to-day, but not to the same extent as in 1874. The Disciples know more about the work of world-wide evangelization now than they did then, and the desire to herald the joyful tidings to the whole creation has increased among us encouragingly during the last quarter of a century. I notice that the "actual receipts" of the Christian Woman's Board during the last year were $106,722.76. This is a handsome increase over the year ending with "the Jubilee Convention."

The success of this organization means success for us all along the line of aggressive evangelistic and educational work. Each auxiliary society is a band engaged in the study of educational and missi nary problems. Nor is it possible to limit the advantages derived from these studies to the women who are members of the auxiliaries. Unless a woman is suffering from lingual paralysis she will talk about the enterprises in which she is interested, and the meetings of these auxiliary bands generate an interest, often amounting to enthusiasm, in the matters considered. Moreover, the spiritual health of the local congregation is promoted. The meetings of the women in their missionary societies are devotional. They sing and pray and talk about the dear Lord and his last command until their hearts fairly glow with a holy enthusiasm. Does not this experience inure to the benefit of the congregation with which the cociety is connected? It must result in an improvement of spiritual health.

Including "balance on hand" Ostober 1, 1899, "loans returned" and "General Fund returned," the receipts of the Christian Woman's Board from October 1, 1899, to October 1, 1900, were $143,961.69.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society is forging to the front as one of the great missionary organizations of the world. Its receipts last year, as doubtless you have seen, were $180,016.16, a gain over the preceding year of $27,288.78. The average offerings of the churches are 40 per cent greater than they were four years ago. Note the fact that this society is now at work on four continents and in eleven countries, and that 257 persons are in its employ. Are you not thrilled as you read the report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society?

"Enough to do at home!" "Heathen in our own land!" True. There is much to do at home. There can be no doubt that there are practical pagans within the limits of the United States. What of it? Before a convert had been made in Jerusalem the Master said: "Make disciples of all the nations." Soon after a beginning was made in Jerusalem the disciples of Christ went everywhere preaching the word. They did not

"THE PRAISE HYMNAL is far and away the best book for all round work I know anything about. The old hymns on which much of the spiritual life of the church depends are in this book, and the new music is of a character that will both please and wear. The select and topical Scriptural readings form a feature entirely new among our people and add greatly to the value of the book as a means of spiritual culture. Those who adopt this book will have no errors to repent of, but will have a continual joy in its use.

wail until all Jerusalem had turned to the Lord before they began to sound out the word of the Lord. And besides, there is this marked difference between the heathen in our land and the pagans in other parts of the earth—the heathen in our country have heard the message and have spurned it, while those abroad have never heard of the Christ and his salvation.

Including the contributions of the Christian Woman's Board the Disciples are giving annually considerably more than $200,000 to Foreign Missions. Does this interfere with the work at home? Not at all. It seems to aid the work in our own land. When these societies were organized the American Christian Missionary Society was but little more than able to pay the salary of the corresponding secretary. Besides the more than $200,000 raised for the evangelization of people beyond the seas, the sum of $63,627.30 was raised last year to carry on the work of the Home Board. Add to this the sum of $114,368.53 contributed by the various state and district societies and expended for mission work in their respective fields, and you see how the work in foreign lands interferes with the progress of organized evangelistic work at home! The fact is that as the interest in world-wide work increases the home work prospers.

No one expected the American Christian Missionary Society to raise $100,000 this year. This amount it raised last year, but we all know the well-nigh desperate effort that was made to secure so large a sum. Those who understand human nature expected something in the nature of a collapse after the special effort of "The Jubilee Year." I gladly confess that the falling off has not been as great as I looked for. A careful study of the report of "the Jutilee Year" will also show that the receipts for the year ending October 1, 1900, available at once for evangel stic work, fell but little short of the amount received the previous year.

But one of the best things in connection with the Kansas City Convention was the report of the Board of Church Extension. Some time ago Scretary Muckley raised the cry of "a quarter of a million for the Board of Church Extension before the close of 1900." This seemed to some of us almost wild. Let us pause to thank God for the faith, courage, and optimism of G. W. Muckley. We need men who "laugh at impossibilities and cry, it must be done." The printed report of this Board shows $252,129.13 in the treasury. The report of the Board is now before me, containing annotations in the handwriting of some one in the Kansas City office, saying that there are now $260,000 in the Church Extension Fund. The new receipts during the year were $57,118.83. There was "a gain in the total receipts" over the preceding year of $16,839.46.

The method and work of this Board commend it to the judgment of level-headed business men. It is a great blessing to weak churches located where money commands a high rate of interest to be able to obtain money from the Board of Church Extension at the rate of four per cent per annum with which to secure a permanent church home. No congregation can be regarded as permanently established until it has secured a house of worship as its own.

The annuity plan is growing in favor. "The Board receives money from generously disposed friends of Church Extension, on which it pays six per cent interest annually as long as the donor lives. At the death of the person so giving his money, the gift becomes the permanent property of the Church Extension Fand without further obligations on the part of the Board. The money will be loaned out to build churches just as other funds of the Board, but will be loaned at six per cent., the amount paid the annuitant, instead of four per cent., the amount charged on General Fund loans." The report continues: "How much better it is to give money to this Fund and have it building churches while it is earning six per cent., than to have it earning the same per cent. in some secular employment where it may not be well secured, and where time will be wasted in reinvestment. The interest will always be paid promptly, and at the death of the annuitant the money will go directly into the Church Extension Fund, where it would have been placed by will. The money is earning the annuitant the same interest, and he can see his money building churches while he lives, and without contest will go where he wants it to go at his death." What do you think of this? Isn't it a good plan? B. B. T.

AT THE SHRINE OF STE. ANNE.

My last letter left the reader at quaint old Quebec, the Gibraltar of Canada, if not of the continent. I now want to take the reader with me on a side trip to the far-famed shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupre, a distance of twenty miles below Quebec, on the same side of the St. Lawrence River. The name of this place is French, and means "Saint Anne of the beautiful meadow."

The wonderful Falls of Montmorency-nearly a hundred feet higher than those of Niagara-are eight miles below Quebec and can be visited or seen from the car window on the trip to Ste. Anne de Beaupre. The water falls perpendicularly over the face of the rock, a distance of 250 feet, and is then broken into white and fleecy spray. Its roar is tremendous and can sometimes be heard many miles away. The falls can be approached and seen to excellent advantage from below, and thus the tiresome descent to their foot, and yet more tiresome climb back again, be avoided. Near the head of the falls, from the old manor of the Hall family, which a hundred years ago was the country residence in Canada of the late Duke of Kent, the father of Queen Victoria, there is a splendid view of the river, surrounding country and City of Quebec. But we started with our face toward the celebrated shrine of Ste. Anne, where hundreds of thousands of pious pilgrims, from all parts of Canada and the United States, go every year to be healed of the various maladies that flesh is heir to, and we do not propose to be turned aside very long by Dukes' residences or roaring cataracts.

Ste. Anne de Beaupre has a history reaching back 250 years, and is now one of the most celebrated spots on the continent. It is claimed that great miracles, even as of apostolic times, are wrought here-that the sick are healed, the blind see, the deaf hear, the lame walk with ease, and those that are nigh death's door have strength and vigor given them, and that, too, suddenly and through the intercession of the good Ste. Anne, the Virgin Mary's mother, one of whose fingerjoint bones -with some flesh and skin yet adhering to it-is still shown in a glass box in the parish church, and venerated and even kissed by hundreds of thousands of devotees, who go annually to worship at this shrine and be cured of their chronic diseases.

Ste. Anne de Beaupre is a small burg, with a population of about 1,000, and would be of no consequence to the traveler were it not for the interest, which is still on the increase, that attaches to this wonderful shrine. The population, as in all other parts of this country, is almost entirely French Catholic and, like many who come to the shrine from a distance, not the most intelligent.

The origin of this shrine was as follows: According to Catholic tradition, two places, Nazareth and Sephoris-at the foot of Mt. Carmel-contend for the honor of being the residence of Ste. Anne, the mother of the Virgin Mary. When she died, her remains were interred near Jerusalem, in the valley of Jehoshaphat. From that vale, in the days of the Emperor Trajan, when Christianity was yet but a century old, it is claimed that a rudderless ship swept across the Mediterranean Sea bearing no less a treasure than the body of Ste. Anne. which was carried to Apt, France, and placed in the keeping of the bishop of that town. It was there that the Emperor, Charlemagne, long years after, discovered this body. In after years Ste. Anne became the patroness of Britanny, and at Auray a shrine was built in her honor, and the simple hearted Breton taught that she performed miraculous cures for all who trusted her.

In 1608 the city of Quebec was founded. A few years later a crew of Breton sailors were buffeted unmercifully by a terrific tempest, which made them to despair of all earthly help, and in their straits turn toward their own people and this shrine for help. There and then they made a vow to build a shrine in honor of Ste. Anne of Auray, if she would guide them safely through the storm. They landed at last, as they supposed under her protection, at the very spot in this French village where now stands the Basilica, one of the finest Catholic structures in the Dominion. There they built a humble chapel in fulfilment of their promise. In 1660 it became necessary to rebuild this unsubstantial edifice, which was primitive in the extreme. In 1770, the chapter of Carcassone, in France, sent out a relic of Ste. Anne-I presume this is the bone out of her finger that all pilgrims are permitted to kiss-to be kept in the new shrine. Other rich presents came from the Court of Louis XIV and Queen Anne, of Austria. From this time on the religious fervor grew and united with national enthusiasm to make this humble spot one of the most notable on this continent.

On entering the splendid new church above mentioned, which is of the finest Corinthian architecture, one of the first things that meets the eye is the vast quantity of crutches, wooden legs, trusses and other things that have been used by the lame and infirm, all built into two great pyramids in the front end of the church. In front of the altar platform, on a pillar of Italian marble twelve feet high, stands the magnificent statue of Ste. Anne, with a golden halo encircling her head and face, and holding in her arms the child Mary. In the base that supports this pillar our guide, a priest, showed us a piece of the rock on which the Virgin Mary was born, and told us that this was a fact as well authenticated as any other fact in history. This statement also included the tale about the bone out of St. Anne's finger, and another about a silk handkerchief-which was shown to us-on which our Savior had wiped the sweat from his brow, leaving upon it his perfect likeness.

Ste. Anne, of course, is the great center of attraction not only in this temple, but in the two other smaller chapels close by and, in fact, throughout this region. Even the Virgin Mary has but little glory here by reason of the glory that excels it. At all hours of the day the worshipers can be seen crowding around the statue of their "good Ste. Anne," supplicating her for favors of some kind. Through her intercession it is claimed that thousands of cures are effected, as in the days of Christ and his apostles.

During the half day we spent at this shrine we neither saw nor heard of any miracles being wrought. One case, however, did claim our attention and our sympathy. It was the case of a poor mother who had come with her crippled son all the way from New York state. So confident was she of his being healed she left his crutches behind. But after having been at the shrine a day or two she had been compelled to send for his crutches, and with a sad and disappointed heart commence the journey back to their home without securing the blessing she had so confidently expected.

On leaving this peculiar place, we felt impressed with about four things: (1) The utter absurdity of the claims made for this shrine. All false religions, from Mormonism down to Dowieism, claim to be able to work miracles and can show plenty of old crutches to prove their claims. But no one has ever seen a miracle wrought by any of them. (2) The ignorance of the worshipers who go to this shrine. This is depicted in their faces. (3) The spirit of idelatry that pervades the worship of the entire place. (4) The spirit of money-getting. You can't turn without running against a place where the pilgrims are expected to deposit money. In the one building alone I saw 20 of these places. H. T. MORRISON.

Golden Rule Living.

The lack of positive and practical interest in the Golden Rule as a New Testament guide in the affairs of the Christian life may be attributed to the oft-repeated assertion of the moral man, or semi-religious organization, that it is his, or its, creed.

In debate with such parties it is referred to by them as all-sufficient. They ignore the positive commands of the Savior; the guidance of the Spirit and the practice of the Apostles. Nevertheless the Christian feels the force of the open avowal and the hearer (non-professor) sets it down to the credit of the advocate of the Golden Rule. Why? Because it calls for no open profession of faith. It is broad and humanitarian in the highest sense, and cannot be limited to the church member.

The matter of a Home for the aged, out of pulpit, out of health and means of living as becomes the minister of Christ and servant of all, is the desire of many Disciples who contemplate the demands of the age, and the eternal as well as the temporal fitness of things belonging to a calling so earth rejoicing and heaven-filling.

Such a Home, with beautiful surroundings and well-arranged lands for farming, gardening, stockraising, poultry and many other pleasant and profitable means of diversion and sources of joy, would be headquarters for returned missionaries and a center of godly influence that might send out workers to sections neglected, needy, deserving and in return bless the Home and homes of many of the now inactive and almost discouraged brethren whose voices now seldom sound out the Good News and their hands and hearts are laying hold of things earthly—probably to the hurt of the soul.

Here the "Golden Rule side of Christianity" could be girt about with bands of love and presented to the world—aye, to the Church—as a lovely daughter of Zion and heir apparent.

ON TEMPERANCE PEOPLE.

A little woman out in Tower Hill, Ill., takes a fall out of the temperance people in a letter containing the following: "It is amusing to see some staunch temperance people who would as soon be caught stealing a horse as to be seen going into a saloon, that are tied down, hard and fast, to their coffee cups as much as an old whisky sot is to his morning dram. They give the same excuse that the old sot does, they act the same way, the habit is just as fixed. Their dram does not as quickly intoxicate, but its steady use just as surely breaks down the nervous system and ruins them physically and mentally, frequently setting up some fixed form of chronic disease.

"Consistency, thou ar: a jewel, just as much to day as of old. Either break aray from your slavery—tea, coffee, or any other pernicious habit you may have, or quit preaching to others. I know what I am talking about, for I was a coffee slave for a time and can speak truthfully of its effects. It almost ruined my nervous system, caused constipation, headaches, and sleeplessness. I suppose if I had drank enough at one time to make me entirely drunk, I might have felt easier.

"Finally the stuff began to cause coughing after my meals, then I concluded to part company with the demon, and at once, upon the advice of some friends, took up Postum Food Coffee. The change was marvelcus. I passed from an invalid to a healthy person, in a very short time. I had quit a drug and taken up a strong, powerful, nourishing food in liquid form, and owe my present health to Postum Food Coffee." Name will be furnished by Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.

Chicago Letter.

The system of elevated railroads in this city affords the very best of rapid transit, but it is a system which creates its own troubles. The roar of passing trains impairs the value of adjacent property, and one or two successful suits for damages have brought a vast amount of litigation upon the companies. The latest litigant is the School Board. It seems that a dozen schools have been incalculably damaged by the erection and operation of the roads, the aggregate value being $1,225,000. The only absolute cure for this evil is the abolition of the elevated road, and the only way to make that possible is to start an exodus from city to country, until the city is reduced ir population so that there will be room on the surface for everybody.

The 75 cent gas ordinance has become a law by virtue of the fact that Mayor Harrison did not veto it. Its operation is deferred until January 2, 1901. It is generally understood that the mayor will sign the resolutions calling for a commission to petition the legislature to allow the city to equip and operate a plant of its own. And so the problem of municipal housekeeping is being slowly solved. There are very few towns and cities in the country that have put in gas and electric light plants of late but have seen the immense advantage of municipal over private ownership. Why should the many pay toll to the few for a service which the many can render themselves?

The Teachers' Federation is carrying on a systematic effort to enforce equitable taxation. There are not funds enough properly to operate the public schools, and this lack led to the investigation. The teachers have discovered that the capital stock of corporations entirely escapes taxation. After making all proper reductions they declare that $235,000,000 of corporate property has been going untaxed for more than twenty years. A mass meeting will be held at Central Music Hall, Monday, October 30, to receive reports.

At the North Side Church of Christ, October 21, Wm. Brooks Taylor preached his last sermon in the morning, and the new pastor, Thad. S. Tinsley, was installed in the evening. Nearly six thousand dollars was raised on the present indebtedness of the church, and a most hopeful spirit seems to prevail. Mr. Taylor takes up the work of Superintendent of City Missions, for which he seems to be eminently fitted. As has already been announced, the new West Side Church will be dedicated the first Sunday in November, Z. T. Sweeney assisting.

B. B. Tyler has gone to Denver, Col., to preach for the South Broadway Church. He writes: "Mrs. Tyler is feeling as well as I have any right to expect. Her speech is almost entirely restored. I have had a good time in Chicago. Sorry to go away." And the Chicago brethren enjoyed Dr. Tyler's stay. He preached a month or more for the Union Church, to the satisfaction of everybody, and his presence was always welcome at the ministers' meetings. His Denver address is 1042 Logan Avenue.

Melvin Putman; pastor of the First Church at Sedalia, Mo., visited Chicago last week and preached for Union Church. It was the writer's privilege to fill his pulpit for him at Sedalia, one of the largest and best churches in the brotherhood. Under Mr. Putman's leadership they have enlarged and improved their house of worship until the audience room easily seats a thousand. It is a most attractive place, and the array of solid and substantial business men in the audiences that gather impresses the visitor agreeably. This church is a force for righteousness in the city and surrounding country. Here I enjoyed the hospitality of Judge and Mrs. J. N. Dalby and Mr. L. W. Bryant and Miss Laura. Prof. and Mrs. Wilson, now living in Sedalia, were members of the church at Cameron, Mo., and there were some visitors from Chicago.

The C. W. B. M. joins in the support of Geo. A. Campbell with the Austin Church, and thus keeps a valuable man in the city. Prof. W. D. Mac-Clintock is supplying for the First Church. Errett Gates is succeeding splendidly in his can vass for endowment for the Divinity House. F. G. Tyrrell assisted A. R. Spicer in the dedication of the new church at Indianola, I1, October 14. Mr. Spicer is also building a new church at Danville, Iil., as he has built one everywhere he has preached.

A Suggestion for Next Program of our National Convention.

While the matter is fresh in mind I would suggest a few charges in the program of our National Missionary Convention which would save some time and concentrate the thought of the convention for the time being upon one great interest that concerns us'all.

How would this schedule do for the Home Societies program? Saturday evening: Educational Session with a strong address, report of Educational Board and business of the convention in relation to the whole matter of education. In other words. let us give our time and thought during the whole session to educational interests and make the session complete in itself. Give Monday morning to the General Board of Home Missions, in which we shall have the president's address, the secretary's report and all other business pertaining directly to the American Christian Missionary Society. Let all the committees of this society report, officers be elected and all business be transacted with dispatch and enthusiasm. Monday afternoon could be given to Church Extension and all its interests. But let it also be a session complete in itself with all the business of the convention in relation to this department brought into it and completed. Let Monday evening in the same way be devoted to Christian Endeavor. Give Tuesday morning to Sunday-school work, making everything contribute to that interest; and bring the whole of Tuesday afternoon under tribute to the cause of Benevolence, Ministerial Relief and Orphanage work. It seems to me we should group these two phases of Christian service under one head, for they are only different phases of the same cause, the same work after all. Why should we not have a secretary of benevolence to whom we may commit all this work as one? Tuesday evening could be given up to the work of City Evangelization, one of the most important and also one of the most difficult problems confronting us in America to-day.

Wednesday could be made Foreign Missions' Day, as it was at Kansas City. One secret of the enthusiasm of the sessions on that day was the fact that the program was concentrated and thereby intensified. Of course it would not be necessary to follow the order here indicated, that is a matter of small moment, but the question of grouping all the interests of one department and concentrating all the time and strength of the whole convention in a given session upon that one department and its welfare is of the highest importance. If this were done all the business of the convention would be transacted in the general assembly of the people and not off to one side. The business should be transacted in the body of the convention, for all the people are interested in it, or at least they should be.

Then let Wednesday night bring the whole to a close with the very best program that can be provided for the deepening of spiritual life. Let the closing session be genuinely and intensely religious.

Two or three short addresses might be given, with a good prayer service to close with. This arrangement would allow ample time for the proper consideration of all our missionary work and save a whole day of valuable time.

These things are written not in the spirit of criticism, but merely to open the way to a fuller discussion of the subject in the hope that good for our missionary cause will come of it. Brethren, what have you to say about the matter? Now is the time to speak.

S. T. WILLIS.

[The foregoing suggestions are worth considering by our various Boards. Condensation and concentration would seem to be desirable features for our programs. The formation of our National Educational Society would probably modify the suggestion as to the Saturday evening session, for that Society would require more time unless it holds an independent convention at another time and place, which it may determine to do. It would hardly be practicable to limit the business of the American Christian Missionary Society, proper, to one session. It might, however, be limited to one day. This would require that committees should be appointed and have their work assigned some time before the convention meets, so that they may give their reports proper consideration and present them for approval at the meeting of our General Board. They could then be carried through the conventions with proper explanations and emphasis within the time specified. Every one will agree that if it is possible to so condense the program as to have the var!ous important departments which are now considered in sections, considered before the wno'e convention, it would be very desirable. It is entirely practicable, too, to cut down the number of addresses and give a little more time for business and thus shorten the program and facilitate business at the same time. The matter is open for any further suggestion from any one interested in our National Conventions .- EDITOR.]

Concerning Oregon Missions.

The missionary outlook in Oregon is prophetic of success, one of the hopeful features is the Eugene Divinity School, a first-class place for the preparation of young men for the ministry of the gospel. The Divinity school building is situated just across the Oregon University campus. Hundreds of young people attend the University of Oregon yearly, and in them is born a liking for Eugene Divinity School. The enrollment at the Eugene Divinity School increases each year and is very encouraging in this respect. Its influence is felt in all the country surrounding Eugene. The young men go out and preach in the school houses and many of the churches. In their work they have done planting and cultivation of the truth among the people that is commendable. They report a large number of additions, and this is but the beginning. At the close of last term some graduated and at once assumed work in the churches. They were employed in close proximity to the Eugene Divinity School and this is but the beginning of this part of our work. God will bless it.

The second bright outlook is the increasing help the churches are extending to the fie'ds of need. It looks as if, not in the hopeless, distant future, but not long hence, every struggling band of the Lord's workers would receive strength. The General Board is helping with a steady, faithful support, and our own brotherhood in the state are seeing virtue in the Oregon Christian Missionary Convention. The two boards together have eight missions: Ashland, Roseburg, Coquille, Turner, Tillamook, Hood River, Pendleton and Lagrande. An evangelist is also kept at work full time. The General Board alone is giving the help to Pendleton and Hood River and supporting the evangelist. The State Board is alone extending aid to Ashland. Roseburg and Turner. Jointly the two boards are aiding Coquille, Tilla wook and Lagrande.

Our missionaries are a splendid set of menself-sacrificing, enduring, able, well-balanced, bringing forth fruit to remain. They are just that $600 kind that someone wrote about a short time ago. And that is the salary all through.

They are, J. F. Tout, Ashland; W. A. Wood, Roseburg; J. M. Hunter, Coquille; C. G. Lemasters, Turner; J. W. Jenkins, Hood River; C. A. Dotson, Pendleton; O. H. King, Lagrande. We are now ready for our Tillamook man. We thought we had arranged for the right man, but disappointment clouded our expectations. We are now in correspondence with others. We invite correspondence. But strangers applying must have two recommendations; one from B. L. Smith and one from your own state corresponding secretary.

We have 125 life members in our O. C. M. C., pledged to pay $5.00 a year for five years. There are in the state 7,681 members enrolled, making 119 places, weak and strong, where work is being done for the Lord, as we understand him in his word.

This expansive missionary work had its beginning, as to the O. C. M. C., in the autumn of 1891, when an evangelist was sent out by the General and State Boards. Then there were but two missions aided by the General Board. Now we have the eight, with good hope of wide expansion. Some of the places now being helped can soon stand alone and give place to others. Our income is growing year by year.

The present fields raise from half to threefourths of the salary. We make it a rule that the field shall raise at least half the support. The evangelist is limited in the same way-to new fields and raise half his support in the field. He has reported an average of more than 100 additions yearly; he has baptized 133 persons in three years; has coupled with his work the work of corresponding secretary; his salary has averaged less than $600 and has presented no bill of railroad expense.

Our Rally Day for State Missions is the first Lord's day in November. And many of our churches are getting to be prompt in taking the collection. We call this "Oregon Day." We want to make the duties of this day felt in the hearts and consciences of our brethren. We look for it to become a great day in Oregon, because the Oregon Christian Missionary Convention is to become the greatest gathering of any in our state, whether political, religious, or social. The good things are provided there for the people and they will

We have asked most of the churches to double up this year, because ou work has doubled up and there is no other way to get it done than to double J. B. LISTER.

Down East.

Our meeting in Halifax was in every way a pleasant one, though there were but four confessions. The time of year was unfavorable for protracted meetings. The summers here are so short that while they last, out-door recreations have the right of way. The Halifax church numbers but 50, none of them rich and nearly all poor, and yet they raise more than $1,000 a year, and during our four weeks' meeting their free will offerings were $100. What church in the world can beat that? Bro. E. C. Ford is the pastor and is doing a good work. The Lord willing I shall return to Halifax for another meeting next Feb-

My next meeting was at West Gore, in Hants Co., Nova Scotia. This place is about forty miles northeast from Halifax, and is at present twenty miles from a railroad. And yet, in this obscure place there is as cultured a community as one will find in a long time. The place is noted for the production of school teachers, and while I was there they were all at home, and I have seldom seen a larger per cent. of fine-looking young peo ple. This community has sent out many professional people who have made their mark in the world. Among these are M. B. Ryan, of Erie, Pa.; and Hiram Wallace, who was once Garfield's pastor at Mentor, O., and who now sleeps in the cemetery at West Gore. I was there nine days and baptized four young men.

On my way from West Gore to St. John, I spent two days with Bro. R. E. Stevens in Cornwallis, N. S. Our little church there is one of unusual interest, being the early home of T. H. Blenus and Josephine Smith. Here upon the shores of the Basin of Minas and in full view of Grand Pre', the home of Evangeline, grew to womanhood the first missionary among our people to give her life for Christ in Japan. In all my travels I have never seen a more beautiful country than the Cornwallis valley in Nova Scotia. I had read so much about it that it did not seem strange, and I never felt so much at home in a new place. Indeed, Acadia has quite won my heart. I do not wonder that the old French did not want to leave it.

Reaching St. John the second time, I preached at the opening of the new Christian church on Douglas Ave. This congregation is over six years old, but till now has not worshiped in a house of its own. Bro. J. C B. Appel, who once belonged to has not worshiped in a house of the West London Tabernacle, has been the pastor the West London Tabernacie, has been the pastor here for four years, and the crowning of his work is the erection of the new church. At the dedication the house was crowded, the Coburg Street and Silver Falls churches uniting in the services. Several ministers and leading brethren were present, aming them Dr. R. B. Ray, of Coburg St.; J. C. B. Appel, pastor of the new church; Wm. Murray, of Le Tete, N. B., and U. G. Miller, of Des Moines, Ia Since the dedication we have been preaching to full houses on Sunday, and a good attendance during the week. No providential hindrance I shall remain down here another month and then return home and resume my evangelistic work in the States. St. John, N. B. A. MARTIN. 8

Virginia Notes.

- J. H. Gillespie is now in a meeting with Pembroke Church, assisted by Jas. T. Taylor, of Mechanicsburg, Va. We expect to hear of a good meeting there.
- J. A. Campbell, pastor of Graham church, is in a meeting on Cavetts Creek. No confessions on last Sunday. Bro. Campbell gives one-half of his time to Graham and one half to state evangeliz

A new church building is in course of erection at Springville, which bids fair to be the nicest building we have seen in the country. This is the home of Geo. W. Harless, one of Tazewell's hardest

We had the pleasure of visiting Tazewell College and looking into the faces of many of the best material of this section of the state. Taze well is overflowing this year. Our people in Virginia should awake to the necessity of patronizing our own schools. This is the Athens of learning in the Southwest, and a strong, healthful school should flourish here. The location and scenery cannot be surpassed. It has such men as C. D. M. Showalter, J. N. Harman and Philip Johnson at its head. The moral tone is high and the work efficient. You will make no mistake in patronizing Tazewell church has a very fine opportunity to do good. Philip Johnson is the efficient pastor and is doing a good work. H. W. Pobst is superintendent of the S. S, and is the right man in the right place. He praises the literature of the Christian Publishing Company and will use no other. He has a magnificent school.

Shawver Mills' congregation has the best church building for a country church that I have ever seen. It speaks volumes for the enterprise and interest taken by the members. This congregation had its origia in a still on Clear Fork. Dr. Chester Bullard organized it some forty years ago and his works do follow him. J. C. REYNOLDS.

Food Saves.

DOCTOR KNEW THE VALUE OF GRAPE NUTS.

A breakfast food that a baby can handle is a pretty safe proposition for grown people with weak stomachs. Dr. Wm. Hall, 156 State St., Boston, has tried Grape-Nuts food in his own case, as a resalt of which he says: "I have been relieved from the distressing form of indigestion caused by the non-assimilation of starchy foods, and since making Grape-Nuts a part of my dietary scale, I have had no trouble, and find my power of concentration markedly increased.

"I have frequently prescribed Grape-Nuts food in my practice, with most excellent results. The notes of one case I enclose herewith. July 10:h, '99, called to see M-----, two years and three months old; found the child ill nourished, with waxen skin, enlarged joints, beaded ribs, enlargement of the abdomen, furred tonge, constant vomiting and diarrhoea; in short, a typical case of rachitls. The child weighed fourteen pounds and was daily losing flesh.

"Inquiring into the dietary, I found oatmeal, macaroni, rice, while bread, and milk had formed the chief articles of food, and lately all had been rejected. I at once stopped all other foods and placed her on a diet of Grape-Nuts, which was retained on the stomach from the first.

"On my next visit, July 17, I found the child bright and cheerful, vomiting all stopped, stools formed and natural in appearance, weight 143 pounds. From then, for the next three months, the child made a regular and even improvement, gaining from eight to ten ounces each week. She is now quite recovered. In my opinion, this girl has been saved from an early grave by the use of Grape-Nuts food."

Notes and News.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day.

l'ae day is the Lord's day before Thanksgiving, t is November 25. It is a children's day for ne Missions.

special Children's Day exercise for the Rally for America is being prepared at the home oce, which will be sent to every Sunday-school ing for it. Those desiring can order extra ies for a concert exercise. The exercise is of patriotic songs and recitations which will te a delightful entertainment for the children make them happy in giving to save America. cher, if you see this note, ask your superinilent at once what he is going to do about it. You wish to be among the elect, secure a good day-school offering for America.

he Sunday-schools in 1888 sent to our treasury Home Missions over $400. There was inurated a Children's Day for Home Missions. 1889 this day yielded an income of $875.77; in 10 it reached $2,100; in 1891 it resulted in off-ring of $2,392.97; in 1892, $2,213.05; in 3, $3,550.45; in 1894 the day was abolished, it yielded $1,597.10; in 1895, with no day, Sanday-schools sent $334.62; and in 1896 they stiqued to send $469.36, and in 1898 they sent 4.90 to our treasury. These offerings indicate there is an interest in this work among young people that should be carefully coned. In 1899, the first year the new day was perved, the offerings from the Sanday schools thed $1,352.66; in 1900 the amount reached 178.87; it is a good day for our schools and d for our mission work.

Jote what some of our leading men say of Ily Day:

he Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America is olighest importance. 1. For the cause itself the matter of education and of offerings. 2. If the young people who need to understand tir privileges and obligations. 3. For America, land which has the first claim upon our means prayers.-F. D. POWER

Ve should make the Rally Day for America a at day for the following reasons: 1. To teach lesson of patriotism and love of country. 2 To acquaint them with the needs and perils, el enlist their interest in its redemption. 3. To fulliarize them with the great men and pioneers bur own movement and the principles for which Ly stood. - J. H. GARRISON.

here are several reasons for making the Boys Grls' Rally Day for America a great day: Because of the greatness of the work that o be accomplished by means of their united otributions. If it is made general, the yield in th will be many thousands of dollars, and the ild in souls beyond all estimate. 2. Because the training in benevolence that it will impart the givers. It will go a long way toward saving ir souls. -J. W. McGARVEY.

B ys and Girls' Rally Day should be made a great 7 in all our churches. 1 For the sake of the ldren They need this education in Home Misins. 2. For the sake of the Church. It needs re and more to emphasize "America for Christ." For the sake of our Home Mission Board and our te Board. These need the money and need it diy J. H. McNeill, Muncie, Ind.

We should make our Rally Day for America a pat day, because the future of world-wide irk for Christ depends largely upon the developont of Home Missions. To fail to acquaint our ys and girls with the conditions and needs of aerica is to fail to put the key to the most imperant, productive and powerful field of the rid in their hands. A love for God and native id, and the whole wide world urgas, nay, impatively deman's that we intelligently interest the bys and girls in Home Missions.—Mrs. Helen Moses, Indianapolis, Ind.

Missouri Bible School Notes.

Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America is the Sunday before Thanksgiving and every school in Missouri should keep the day. Send to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, for your concert exercises, free gratis, and make it one of the happiest days of the year. The children and young people will rejoice in their co-operation in making it the "great day of the feast."

R. B. Havener did for the friends and the Christ just what we that knew him were sure would be done, and the new house will soon be under way at Villa Ridge, and will be the only church house in the town. He is now trying to do the same good work at Montevallo.

The Bethe', Ralls Co., Rally was first-class, by the help of the London school in a body, while good delegations were present from Spalding and Centre, but all were so well pleased that we are to have a regular County Rally next year, the various schools taking part as such. Another joyful result of this Rally was the hearty co-operation of the brethren in helping Bethel reduce its church debt, and it was pompt and generous beyond my utmost expectations and was a great help to pastor J. B. Corwine who is always helping the deserving. A few have long carried the burden and God will abundantly bless them for it.

F. F. Schultz, 1325 Webster Avenue, St. Louis, is in the field, and will honor God and bless his servants often as he goes in and out among them. If you need help in any part of North Missouri, write him as above, or this office, and you will not regret it. Our brother is worthy of your heartiest co-operation, and will give perfect satisfaction wherever he goes. Write him.

Jno. W. Coggins sends in the apportionment from Odessa in full, while Pattonsburg does the same, under N. J. Nicholson. Lees Summit accepts her apportionment, remitting one-half. Antioch, in Marion, pays in full on last year, with the assurance of doing as well for this. These are all to be numbered with the friends of God in Missouri whom your servant loves to serve.

The Marion County meeting at Emerson was one of the best in years, the interest, the giving and the results surpassing other years. Emerson was most open in her hospitality, leaving nothing undone that tended to the comfort of her guests, while the congregations favored by the Board are making substantial progress and will before long be self-sustaining.

Bro. M. H. Wood has three houses of worship under way in his old district, and has great hopes that they will be dedicated clear of debt before the bad weather sets in and to this end is seeking the co-operation of E. E. Davidson, the very successful evangelist in the employ of the State Mission Board.

We want to use the fund coming to us by the kindness of S. G Newlon in helping some other needy points in getting houses of worship, but let all such bear in mind that they must do their part towards sustaining the worker.

To this end we labor this year: 50 new schools, 15 new congregations and 15 new houses, 5,000 increase in our Bible-school membership, $5,000 from our schools and 500 friends giving us one dollar each. Will your school help us and will you not be one of the 500? Have 25 of the first hundred now.

Miss Nettie Wood and Mt. Zion, Marion, are friends after mine own heart, the school a cepting the apportionment, Miss Nettie remitting in full, and a like willingness and readiness on your part will give like joy. Try it. H. F. DAVIS. Commercial Bldg., St. Louis.

The Anthracite Region.

Our churches in this valley all report as moving forward. Bro. C. W. Harvey, of Plymouth, is a very busy man. He is president of the ministerial union cleric of Wilkes Barre and vicinity and is held in high esteem by all his ministerial associates and co-laborers. He is secretary of the Eastern Pennsylvania missionary district and has its work upon his heart and will soon have ready to mail to every church in the district their apportionment. This is Bro. Harvey's extra work; besides he has charge of the largest church in this part of the state.

Bro. R. H. Sawtell, of Roarsburg, is in a meeting at the Roarsburg Church with Bro. E. B. Manley, of Altoona, as evangelist.

Bro. Frick, who about eighteen months ago came to Westmore, with his own hands building the chapel, has organized and gathered together quite a good congregation and reports additions at nearly every meeting—six in the last six weeks. Bro. Frick knows how to make sacrifices for the cause of the Master and the Lord is blessing him in his work.

Bro. Bolton, of Sweet Valley, was reported on the sick list, but at last account he was improvtor.

ing.
The Providence (Scranton) Church reports that Bro. R. W. Clymer has been giving them some very practical sermons on up-to-date themes and the work is prospering in all lines.

The Dunmore (Scranton) Church is taking on new life. The report for the quarter ending Sunday, Sept 30th, gave average attendance for the quarter 160, and an average contribution for the same quarter of over $6. This is excellent for a Sunday-school that is only two years old. One confession at prayer-meeting last week and the work is in a healthful condition. Dunmore is preparing to begin the new year with a revival meeting with Bro. A P. Cobb as evangelist.

Conference on Benevolence.

All sessions of the convention were well attended and profitably conducted, and the Conference on Benevolence was not second to any. Bro. Haley is a master of ceremonies generally, but on that occasion he failed, for the women would continue their speech until they had their say.

The reports of the several departments were enthusiastically received and showed much advancement. The two lines of work to be pushed with greatest vigor now are the building of an Old People's Home, at a probable cost of $50,000, perhaps at Jacksonville, Ill., where a beautiful site has been offered for the Home, and the purchase of a farm of fifty acres near St. Louis, on which the permanent buildings for the Orphans' Home are to be placed. The cost of the farm will be about $10,000 and the buildings perhaps $90,000, making a total cost for the two homes of $150,000, which means larger gifts to this divine mission. We have found a few people who have remembered the association in their wills, and some who have given annuities, but the receipts so far are very inadequate for the needs of the work.

The ladies reported all debts canceled in June, but the income during the summer was insufficient to meet the running expenses by about $300.

The Kentucky Widows and Orphans' Home at Louisville is asking for a twentieth century en dowment fund of $50,000 next year, and it should be forthcoming from that great state of liberal-hearted people. Texas also is contemplating the establishment of a home, which we believe to be just the thing to do. We believe other states or groups of states should establish homes just as soon as they can maintain them; but until they can, let it be remembered that the Homes at St. Louis are national and for the use of all the states which have no homes of their own.

Brethren, let us come to the support of this work better than in the past. Those godly women who have stood so faithfully by the enterprise have sacrificed and suffered long enough in silence. Ther, too, the work has assumed such proportions that it is necessary to have more means. Let those who read this, unless your churches have made a liberal offering this year, bring the needs of the Benevolent Association before the churches and urge a special gift. Do not wait for the visit of an agent, for that is expensive to the Association, but urge your pastor to preach a good sermon from Jas. 1:27, and ask for a large gift, and send it to Mrs. J. K. Hansbrough, 5018 Cabanne Ave., St. Louis, Mo., designating to which home of the Association you wish your gift to go.

At this time of the year many boxes of clothing and food-stuffs are usually received. This year, because of an increased number in the several homes, it is desirable to have a larger number of boxes. If you will go to your freight agent you will be surprised how cheaply he will ship the boxes to St. Louis. Ship the box to the Home you desire it to be used by. If to the Orphans Home, to 915 Aubert Ave.; if to the Old People's Home, to 903 Aubert Ave., and if to the Mothers and Babies' Home to 2821 Chestnut St., St. Louis, Mo.

Yours in behalf of the homeless and in His Name, JOEL BROWN.

Iowa Notes.

B. S. Denny dedicated the new church building at Walker, Oct. 28.

Dr. Finleyson, of the Medical College, addressed the Drake students at chapel Wednesday morning. Lawrence Wright did good work at Walker, he goes next to Greeley.

Herman P. Williams, recently chaplain of the Fifty-first Iowa at Manila, takes the work as paster at Jefferson.

The first number of the "Drake Entertainment Course"—the Thomas Orchestra—will be given in the city's new auditorium, Nov. 8.

Get ready for the offering for Iowa missions. "Iowa Day" will be Sunday, Nov. 25. For leaflets, maps, cards, etc., needed for the day, send to B. S. Denny, Cor. Sec., Des Moines.

W. M. Jordan, a student of Drake in the 80's, now of Helena, Mont, gave the students a lively talk at chapel Tuesday morning.

The enrollment of Drake, without counting the Medics and Law students, is 603.

R. N. Linnville, our next-door neighbor and a Drake student, preaches three Sundays in every month at Clark, Mo., 203 miles from Des Moines. He believes in extension.

J. M. Lowe, who returned last week from a successful meeting at Westmoreland, Kan., preached at University Church Sunday forenoon and evening, he is now in a meeting at Stuart, and will begin at Wankegan, Ill., Nov. 18. Address him at University Place, Des Moines.

L. M. Starr preaches at Troy Mills, Walker and Alburnette.

J. C. Wright is in a meeting at Storm Lake with Legrand Pace, the pastor. Write to Wright at Scranton.

 N. McCash is convalescent, but it is said that he cannot be expected home till near Christmas time.

Counting the members of all the classes there are eighty students in the Bible department of Drake.

Harry Walston, of Missouri, is expected to begin work at Knoxville, Nov. 11.

Bussey has two railroads, a population of six or seven hundred and two churches—M. E. and M. P. The first discourse in the town by one of "our preachers will be given in the Opera House, No. 4.

J. H. Painter has bought a home at Eddyvill and will move to it early in November.

Des Moines, Ia.

Illinois Notes.

Illinois Day is the first Sunday in November On this day the churches will tell the board how much work they want done by the offerings they make and send to our treasury. The amount of service rendered is governed entirely by the interest and liberality of the churches and preachers Tell us in dollars how much we shall do.

When you read this, special literature will have been mailed to the ministry and the year books to the churches. Apportionments have been twice sent to the churches. We have done and are doing our best to reach the consciences of all and to interest them in Illinois missions. The only "sympathizing" that does our cause any good is of that kind that expresses itself in offerings to our work. Let us have your sympathy.

If your minister does not arrange to ask for a offering for state missions kindly stir up his purmind. A few words from one of the active members will be a great stimulus. Tell him that the church is willing to give and he will call for the offering. Some preachers underrate the liberality of their congregations. In such cases the congregation needs to show him the way of the Lormore perfectly.

Our convention was greatly pleased with the management of the board for last year. The brethren saw that the board does a careful business and that the great need is more money with which to do more. We should have ten thousand dollars this year without fail.

Our state and district organization is growing more and more perfect and the spirit is fine. The third, fourth, sixth, seventh and eighth district will each support an evangelist this year. This will give a splend!d service but it will take more to support it. The support will be cheerfully given by the church is if they are thoroughly in formed of the work and asked to give it. Breth ren, tell your people about the work and ask ther to contribute. The churches will give if they are asked.

Our church at Indianola dedicated its buildin recently. F. G. Tyrrell was master of ceremonic and A. R. Spicer is the minister. Why not alway have Illinois men to deditate Illinois churches?

The church at Toulon, H. J. Reynolds minister has put in a furnace and made other improvements. Bro. Reynolds has been with the churchine 1896 and has labored successfully though under many difficulties.

The St. Joseph church, H. J. Hostetter minister recently roofed its building. I spent a week ther and found the work growing steadily and the church delighted with the service of the minister and his wife. At this place there is a "church of Christ" and its chief mission is to oppose all advance of the cause. It was a blessing to the brethren when these sectarian people went our and left them in peace. They make several test of fellowship that are unknown to the Scripture and are therefore innovationists and sectarian.

The Springfiel; church gave us a corjisl invite tion to hold the next state meeting with them an we are going to do it. This church is a great friend to our state missionary service.

When I Awaken.

BY GRACE PEARL BRONAUGH.

When I awaken from my final slumber,
Whether my sleep be broken, whether deep,— Whether alone or 'mid a mighty number,—
It matters little so I wake from sleep
To find myself where I have longed to be,
To see a face which I have yearned to see.

A little slumber, yet a little folding—
A little folding of the hands to sleep;
A closing of the eyes, then the beholding
Of Christ, the king! I think we could not keep
So long awake except for work of His,
Which makes life's day seem shorter than it is.

But just an end of all that doth encumber,
But just the end of all the day demands,
And then a little sleep, a little slumber,
And yet a little folding of the hands.
It is so simple! Why do mortals weep?
A little folding of the hands to sleep.

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chapter I .- A Dangerous Man.

There is, on one of the bends of the Ohio River, a prosperous Kentucky settlement. It has houses enough to require a post office (kept, of course, in the store), a blacksmith's establishment, a tavern (with stage accommodations), and a ferry-landing. The shop had a tumble-down appearance, and all about it were signs of neglect. The owner, "Lige" Taggart, was a garrulous, and bothersome fellow who spent most of his time at the store or, worse, at the tavern bar. The one disreputable feature of the place was this bar. By that strange inconsistency, so current in this country, they had a bar, although four-fifths of the people in the county disapproved it and only a few patronized it. It was not until a little woman came along and made a speech or two at the county seat that the people conceived the notion of ridding themselves of the nuisance. This lady passed the gauntlet of popular objection to female orators before her first speech was finished; and such crowds attended the second speech that they could not all be seated in the spacious court-room. After the third speech the whole county (speaking figuratively) was ready to vote the demon out. Local option prevailed, and the bar at the Bend had to close. The tavernkeeper himself voted with the majority, for he had the best of reasons for casting that sort of ballot.

Lige was the most conspicuous objector in the precinct. He worked very hard to defeat the measure, but his uncouth speeches were only laughed at; and when the vote came, he and old Ben Greenwell, who had for ten years been fed at the county's expense, and Rip Peak, who sold whisky at the ferry, and a half-dozen negroes were all the voters who favored the bar.

Lige was much disappointed. He had borrowed Walter Brown's buckboards and horse and carried about a large jug of liquor sent over to Peak by the Madison distillery, and had neglected his shop two whole days in an effort to prepare the people for the vote. But the boys laughed at him and gave him the sobriquet "Windy Tag." They imitated his harsh voice and repeated his speech; and currently asserted that he had made almost as many voter for local option as the gifted Mrs. Nield.

When it was all over and the bar was closed, Lige delivered his judgment in the way of a declaration of independence. "I'm a goern to leave this yur bend, jist as quick as I kin sell my shop. I'll go acrost the river and gi away frum this yur place. Don't anybody know et's dead?" He often repeated this speech, and punctuated it with so much profanity that all the decent people felt inclined to second his efforts and help him to advertise the property. Fortunately for the people, the clamor found its way up the river to Sunrise, a regular whisky town on the Indiana side, about forty miles distant.

In Sunrise there lived a smith named Norris, who had tried with all his might to create a temperance sentiment. Repeatedly had he failed; for he was under the shadow of a great brewery whose beer stands were on five conspicuous corners, and the community was veritably forced into an odious atmosphere, reeking with the fumes of the dirty business. Job Norris had bought there on account of the town's reputation as a good business point. But he had regretted the purchase almost immediately, and had, after two years of effort, just now advertised his place for sale. Hearing of the shop at the Bend, and, with it, Taggart's reason for desiring to sell, he boarded the steamer Hattie Brown and made the place a Desiring to know of the place before the place knew of his errand, he went directly to the tavern. Noticing the empty barroom, he inquired of the landlord, "Can't a man get a drink in this place?"

"No, stranger! There's nobody sellin' it in these parts."

"How's that? Why doesn't somebody sell?"

"Well, sir, we've ousted it."

"Who's ousted it?"

"All of us, we might say; for there were not a dozen of our people in favor of continuing the business."

"Well, isn't that a little queer? Hadn't you any saloon keeper here?"

"Yes, sir, I was the dram-seller myself, and I've sold over two thousand dollars' worth over that counter in a single year. We've suffered a good deal from crowds of men who came in here from the hills and from up and down the river."

"Well, do I understand that you voted against it?"

"Yes, that's the fact; and I had reasons for it. If you care to know, I'll tell you what they were."

Job said, "By all means; let me know, for it is a case of much interest to me."

The landlord, displaying a look of ine "Well, si pressible sadness, proceeded. firstly, I was drinking too much myself; ar while it was so convenient, I found it grow ing more and more difficult to withhold. Se ondly, the crowds that gathered in here Saturdays and Sundays were so profane as so indecent that my wife and daughter we subjected to shocks at every turn; and the business was making them unhappy. Third ly, I had two boys, 19 and 21 years of ag and I saw them falling into the ways of vic-I made my mind up, a year ago, to quit th business; but I didn't quit; it just seemed couldn't.

"One night last June my youngest be was shot and killed by one of the best friend he had in the world, right there by the hitching-post. It was drink that made hi shoot, and I sold him the drink." Here the poor man paused and cried audibly for se eral seconds. Then he resumed.

"Coming back from the burial, I told m wife I was going to quit the business. But I didn't quit. About the same time of the day, a month later, my other boy was chall to pieces right there in that room, by ruffian from the river, and the ruffian wardrunk, as before, on my whisky! The stranger, don't you think it was time to call a halt?"

"God bless you, yes!" answered Job.

people are agreed to a sentiment like th
I was informed that your blacksmith desir to sell out. Is this true?"

"Yes, he doesn't like the turn we too and we would all like for a good workman to take his place."

It was not long until Lige was called and Mr. Barnet (the landlord) was amus to hear him extol the place. It was "one the best pints on the river fur a stea business." He said he would sell, or trace if he could "strike a bigger place." So, make the story shorter, the trade was so consummated, and Job Norris brought h family to the Bend. There was generated rejoicing from the beginning, and, as t people found the family raking up the traspulling down the old sheds and fences, pt ting in new tools and a new forge and clea ing up generally, the rejoicing increase Mrs. Norris and the girls wrought a simil renovation in and about the house. With pretty curtains and its new dressing of pail the cottage became quite as attractive appearance as any in the village; and with things came around so clean and order that callers were delighted. They all we out exulting over the change from Tagga to Norris.

There was, at the Bend, a meeting-hou used by its owner, the Missionary Bapt Church. They had half-time preaching supplied by a very bright young minist whom let us call Henry. Rev. Henry sided at Sunrise, where the other half his time was employed. He knew Job Noris quite well and none rejoiced more on the exchange than he. Sunrise was a lateral was place, and Taggart was easily absorbed mong his kind there, and would cut no figre. So, too, Job Norris was a Disciple, nd as his membership was not with the aptists there, he could do them no good. e knew Norris and his whole family to be ecently and consistently religious, and he ad hopes that they would offer for memberip with his charge at the Bend.

As Job had no conveyance, and the neart congregation of Disciples was five miles way, he accepted the cordial invitation of e committee who visited him, and offered mself, as did the rest of the family, for embership.

Knowing them as a praying family, who sed no improper language nor drank nor ven chewed or smoked tobacco, they aditted the whole family to membership ithout the array of questions usually proounded by the Baptist people, and at once ley went to work. None were more attenve to the church services or more efficient Sunday-school. And, as Rev. Henry had armly commended them, the pulse of the hole church was accelerated by their acession to its rolls.

But there is a devil in the churches and s name is sectarianism. The Bend congreation was not an exception. Job, being a ery intelligent man and a good teacher, ame at once to the head of his class, and ley put him in charge. His work was exptionally well received, as was also that his wife in another class, and things went a pleasantly until one day the matter of ne Lord's Supper came up for discuson. The passage read was, "Let a man ramine himself and so let him eat" (1 Cor. 1:28). Without intention on the part of orris or any one else the matter of Close ommunion was sprung Bro. Guthrie, the illage teacher, asked: "Is the doctrine of lose Communion taught in the New Testa-

"I think not," answered the conductor of ne class. "This same passage is to me a ifficient answer to that question. We are ore than once cautioned against judging thers, and almost as frequently are we ounseled to examine ourselves. The Safor meant this by his use of the mote and he beam. The apostle says, 'examine yourelves, whether ye be in the faith' (2 Cor. 3:5). So I am constrained to believe we re forbidden to pass on the fitness or unfitess of any one except ourselves. I can, herefore, not decide a man's right to parake. I cannot withhold the privilege from ny one who deems himself qualified.'

Not much was said about this that day; ut it was talked over later, and some of he very faithful appeared anxious about it. Prof." Guthrie said, in the store, that he elieved the blacksmith was right, although was a new view of the subject to him. at Joseph Revell, the leader of the singing, aid Norris was not a good Baptist. Squire ee, who had served a term in the clerk's ffice, approved Bro. Revell's view, and addd: "My opinion is he'll bear watchin'."

By Thursday, the Squire was a self-apointed committee of one to see after this matter. He called at the shop with a job of shoeing; and, while Bro. Norris was trimming old Clyde's enormous hoof, himself keeping off the flies with a horse-tail brush, he broke the silence with this question: "Bro. Norris, if a sinner should ask you what to do to be saved, what would you say?"

Norris replied: "I would quote Peter's answer to that same question, Acts 2:38.

"And how does that read?" said the Squire. Norris replied: "It reads, 'And Peter said unto them, Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.' "

Squire: "Bro. Norris, that ain't good Baptist doctrine. We don't use that verse."

Norris, straightening up: "I am surprised that the Scriptures are not good Baptist doctrine! What is the matter with that Squire: "There's plenty of Scripters without usin' that. We don't use that; an' we'd ruther you wouldn't."

Job: "Why do you not use that verse?" Squire: "The principal reason is, it sounds like water salvation; and that's Campbellite doctrine. That is the one verse they are always a-throwin' at us. They are very bitter aginst us, and they are always a-takin' our members."

Job resumed his work on the hoof and while fitting the shoe he said: "I am not able to see the harm in giving a scriptural answer to a question of so great importance; and until I do see it, I shall feel it my duty to use the word as God evidently intended it should be used."

From this point, there was a period of silence; and when the conversation opened again it was directed to other subjects.

When the shoeing was done, the Squire paid his bill and departed. Job was left grieving over the ungodly character of sectarianism, and Squire Lee went back to his home fully convinced of what he feared in the Sunday-school class: That Bro. Norris, although one of the purest and best of Christians, was, nevertheless a dangerous Explaining the Bible in Osaka.

A few weeks ago a couple of young men called at our door and asked for a Bible. When they had bought it, I invited them into the parlor, and, according to the custom, I offered them cakes and coffee, but they hurriedly refused them and shot out of the house as if some great danger were in their way. In a few days, however, they ventured back, saying that they couldn't understand the book we sold them, so I offered to explain the Bible if they would come regularly to hear it, and since that time they have come twice a week, bringing friends with them, so now there is a nice class of ten or eleven young men. It is most unusual, for young men especially, to come and want to study the Bible without asking for English, too .- Mrs. Lila C. Winn, in Bible Society Record.

Our Chief Rulers.

C. H. WETHERBE.

In these days when much is being said about the wide prevalence of irreverence in respect to divine things, and when the lack of respect for those in high authority is greatly deplored by many good people, it is needful to call attention to the fact that the Bible demands that all men everywhere should show a proper regard for our chief The Bible is just as explicit in this demand as it is in regard to any other requirement. All Christians are commanded by God to pray for those who are in authority over them. This does not mean that Christians are to pray for only such rulers as belong to their own political party, but it means that prayers should be made by all Christians for all who are in authority, utterly regardless of party politics. But how can those Christians pray heartily for any ruler whom they so disrespect as to employ bitter and abusive epithets against him? Are we to believe that those Chris tians who continually denounce President McKinley in opprobrious terms sincerely and devotedly pray for him? It is unreasonable to believe that they do. See what Paul says in 1 Tim. 2:1, 2, R. V.: "I exhort, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings be made for all men, for kings and all that are in high place; that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life, in all godliness and gravity." And remember that kings and others in high places in those days were very far from being model men. They were hostile to Christianity; they were tyrannical, unjust and often cruel; many of them were grossly immoral; and yet, bad as they were, the Christians of that time were exhorted, at the command of God, to pray for just such rulers. Not only were all Christians to pray for those rulers, but to supplicate God for them, to intercede for them, and even to offer thanksgiving for them.

But here, in our day, there are Christians, even some editors of Christian newspapers, who often rail against our chief rulers, employing terms of the greatest disrespect, and in some instances making false accusations. Is it any wonder that under the influence of such examples the spirit and practice of irreverence towards those in a "high place" are encouraged and fostered in the young people of our land? None at all. Very differently did Paul act. When the high priest, Ananias, commanded certain ones to smite Paul on the mouth, Paul said, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall." Some who heard these words reproved Paul, when he at once apologized, saying that he did not know that Ananias was high priest, and then remarked: "It is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of a ruler of thy people." Practical Sermons from Revised Texts.

BY REV. PRACTICAL CHRISTIAN.

Subject: LAYING-UP.

TEXT: Lay up for yourself treasures on the earth. Mt. 6:19. Business Bible.

The Lord in his Sermon on the Mount became very practical. He got right down to the bottom of life and gave his disciples some business pointers. Lay up for yourselves treasures, said he. And I thank God that is what all our good brethren are trying to do. Some have a thousand dollars laid up, some fifty thousand and some a million. I praise the Lord for the success of his followers in obeying his word to lay up treasures.

The Great Preacher does not say how to get the treasures so we are at liberty to get them any way we can just so we don't violate the law. And if the laws are not favorable to our laying up large treasures we will get the laws changed. We are determined to obey the Lord's command even if all our neighbors are so irreligious as to remain poor.

When the church wants a bigger place of worship or a bigger preacher it must look to those who have laid up.

There is nothing like laying up for a rainy day.

V.-Linda May Hides Her Dog. Continued.

At first Aunt Dollie was too amazed and rightened to think at all. She had shut up ne dog in the storm cellar, and, behold, vo dogs had come out at breakneck speed! hey had caroused after the stray cat right to her parlor, and she had heard her glass itcher crash to the floor. She knew the arpet was flooded with ice-water. And ow the bird-dog crouched at the foot of her herry-tree as if he had come there to live, nd the second dog-the dog that had brung into existence as by magic-was agging his tail at Linda May. Evidently hat shepherd dog was acquainted with her iece. But no matter how many things rowd upon you in a second, there is always ne thing to do first. Miss Dollie rushed or a cloth and mopped up the ice-water, at he same time ordering Linda May to gather p the broken fragments and throw them ver the fence. Linda May started into the ouse but Lucifer followed. When Miss ollie looked over her shoulder and saw the og in the room with his tail between his gs-because he wasn't quite sure that he ad done the correct thing-her patience as at an end. She turned to the lady who as visiting her and said: "Mrs. Bimby, I ie, but I am not at home to their dogs!"

"Go on out!" cried Linda May to the dog, an agony of alarm. "Oh, Lucifer, ucifer!"

"Well!" cried Miss Dollie, sinking into a hair. "Well! It seems it is not enough for to have dogs and cats taking possession f my house, but I must live to hear my lece swear!"

"I am really surprised," said Mrs. Bimby, taring at Linda May. "She is the last hild I would have thought of doing that!"

"Lucifer!" cried Linda May, stamping or foot at her dog. She felt that there was a crisis in the air, but she didn't know what crisis. The dog wouldn't go out. He ast flattened himself on the floor, trembling, with his tail bent under him to such an exent that it looked like it might never tick out right any more.

"If he won't go out without you," said liss Dollie, with irony, "pray go with him inda May. You and your dog! But we'll se about your swearing. Swearing I will of have!"

"What do you mear, Aunt Dollie? Why, nat Dollie, you know I never swore in my fie."

"It's from letting you run with those aris girls," said Miss Dollie. "Go on out, Linda May, this instant! I'll not have that dog on my carpet!"

"But, Aunt Dollie, what do you mean about my swearing? I never heard Madge or Pete or Jennie swear in my life!"

"Linda May, will you stand there arguing while those fleas are just gambolling and cavorting up and down my carpet?"

Linda May started toward the door with a bursting heart. "Come on, Lucifer," she said between her sobs.

"Why, Miss Dollie," cried Mrs. Bimby, "the dog's name is Lucifer. Don't you understand? It wasn't swear, after all!"

"Oh, no," cried Linda May, seeing light. "I named him that because it sounded so soft and pretty. I saw it once in a book."

"You named him?" cried Aunt Dollie. "And pray how long have you had your dog, Linda May?"

"He came just last night," said the child.
"There was a can tied to his tail and I untied it. And so I put him in the cellar till I could get somebody to take him. He was glad."

"Last night!" echoed Auut Dollie. "Did he come into your bedroom? Linda May, were you cut in the yard after I went to bed?"

"Yes'm." Linda May looked very guilty. "Who was with you, Linda May?"

"Oh, nobody. It was only ten o'clock. I just walked around and found Luci—found the dog."

All this time Aunt Dollie had been cleaning the carpet and straightening the things. Now she stood up with that look on her face that meant a whipping. "Linda May, can you get that beast out of my house?" So Linda May went out of the room, and of course Lucifer followed. Then Mrs. Bimby and Miss Dollie sat down and talked about the church festival and Mrs. Grigg's new bonnet, just as if there was no Linda May in the world! As soon as the girl reached the front yard there she saw Madge coming.

"We can't take the dog," Madge said.
"Mamma can't afford to feed hin. But,
Linda May, what's the matter?"

"Aunt Dollie's found out," said Linda May. "I am going to get whipped."

"When?" asked Madge, with interest.

"Just as soon as Mrs. Bimby and her little girl go home. Madge, ain't Mrs. Bimby's dog a funny-looking dog? I'm glad Lucifer looks like he has something on. I'd think bird dogs would get cold"

"Well," said Madge, "I wouldn't be thinking about dogs if I was going to catch it! I'll tell you what to do. You begin to holler real loud when she lights in on you, and she'll think'—

"I've tried that," said the other, despondingly. "'Tain't any use." They sat down on the sidewalk outside the yard. It was high up from the road, so their legs could swing. "I'll tell you," said Madge. "When Mrs. Bimby goes I'll be here, and I'll just stay and stay and stay till supper time."

"No use, Madge. If you were to stay till morning it'd be all the same to Aunt Dollie. She'd soon whip one time's another. No, you go on home when Mrs. Bim'y comes out. I want to get it over so I can think of something else."

"What's she whipping you for, anyway?"
"It's not for keeping the dog," said Linda May, judiciously. "It is for being secret and not telling Aunt Dollie. But I knew if I told her she'd make me drive, Lucifer a way, and I knew if I didn't tell, she'd whip when she find out. I thought it over and I took my chance, Madge."

Just then came up Mr. Edgar Brown. They pretended like they didn't see him, but the strange young man stopped. "Is this a committee on obituaries?" he inquired. "All three of you look very unhappy."

Madge wished he would go on away, but Linda May seized at a straw. "Oh, Mr. Brown, don't you want a dog?"

The young man said with impolite promptness that he didn't. "Very well," said Linda May, coldly. The young man was roused at once. "You don't mean you want to part with yours?" he "cried. "What a fine shepherd!"

"Aunt Dollie won't let me keep him," said Linda May. "He came canned and I unfastened it, and now he won't go away without following me and of course I can't keep away, and Aunt Dollie will send for the marshal as soon as Mrs. Bimby goes home, and there will be a shot dog! I wanted Madge to keep him so I could visit, him whenever I visited her. But Mrs. Morris don't want to feed him, and I guess I won't ever see Lucifer any more."

"Lucifer, I presume, is his name."

"Yes. Aunt Dollie said it was swearing, but he don't seem to mind it, and it sounds good"

"I don't like it," said Madge. "It sounds too much like matches."

"I don't think it does," said Linda May.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said Mr. Edgar Brown, drawing a whipcord from his pocket and making a slip-knot, "I'll take Lucifer and keep him for you, and he'll be your dog. And I'll manage so you'll get to see him often." Wasn't Mr. Edgar Brown a strange young man?

"I am glad," said Linda May. So the young man slipped the noose over Lucifer's head and coaxed and pulled till he got him away. Then Mrs. Bimby went home and so did Madge. But there's no ue to dwell on the scene between Linda May and Aunt Dollie. Most of us have either whipped or been whipped, and we know that while it is a serious business it is not necessarily fatal. Miss Dollie never whipped when angry. She did the work as calmly and as dispassionately as she kneaded her biscuit dough. I think Linda May did wrong, but I wouldn't have whipped her, myself. However, Miss Dollie is raising her and not I, so we must not interfere while she is spanking moral prin iples and good intentions into her little niece. And besides, it don't hurt us like it did Linda May, so we needn't complain. Linda May didn't want any supper that evening. She wasn't hungry.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.*

The parable of the unrighteous steward, which we studied last week, was so plainly a rebuke to the Pharisees, whose love of money was notorious, that they could not be blind to its bearing. But their hearts were hardened against reproof. Luke tells us that "The Pharisees, who were lovers of money, heard all these things; and they scoffed at him." The last phrase, literally translated, is "they turned up their noses at him." To this contemptuous treatment, Jesus calmly replied, "Ye are they that justify yourselves in the sight of men; but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God." Their religion was a hollow mockery, and all their glory would turn to ashes under the withering light of the divine judgment throne. The Pharisees, who had made the law of God of none effect by their traditions, were lealing men into sip, instead of away from it, as teachers of religion ought to do. Even the sacred precincts of the home had been profaued by their lax customs of divorce; so that many whom God had joined together they had presumed to put asunder: and those thus separated were in turn joined to other unlawful partners, and were living in adultery. Such teachings then, as now, must have proved very unpopular, though sadly needed. After this stinging rebuke to the scoffing Pharisees, the Master returns to the thought with which he had closed the parable of the Unrighteous Servant, and still further emphasizes its lessons by the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus.

Two men are held up to us in complete contrast. One a rich man, who was clothed in purple and fine linen, the raiment of the noble and great of earth. His table was loaded daily with the luxuries that tempt the palate, and a crowd of obsequious servants and retainers fawned upon him and fed upon his bounty. At his very gate lay one whose condition was as miserable as his was happy. Lazarus, whose name means "God help!" as though the echo of his daily prayer of agony, was covered with ulcers, and fed, or rather starved, on the scanty crumbs that he could snatch at the rich man's gate, when fortunate enough to have any fall near enough for him to reach them. He was almost helpless, and so weak that he could not drive away the dogs that hovered around him and tormented him by licking his ulcers. No man cared for him, though many must have passed him daily. Who would not envy the rich man, in contrast with so miserable a lot as this? And who would be willing, for any consideration, to take a place so contemptible and wretched among men as this leprous beggar?

But the world's honor is shame with God, and its wealth but abject poverty. One may be homeless and hungry on earth, and yet be a child of the King. There is an "afterwards" to all the world's experiences of joy and sorrow, and it is plainly written that "the first shall be last, and the last, first." Soon the end of both prince and pauper comes, and the contrast is equally marked. "The beggar died, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom;" but another name, among the Jews, for the paradise where the righteous dwell forever. It is probable that the body of Lazarus received no formal burial, but was cast into the potter's field, without prayer or other sacred service. But his soul found holy and happy company; and he who had only the dogs of the street for his companions on earth, now occupies the place of honor in Abraham's bosom. Of the rich man we are told that "the rich man also died, and was buried." Doubtless his shroud was of finest silk, and his bier adorned with costly trappings. He was borne from a palatial home to an elegant tomb, from a sumptuous table to an ample apartment where the worms might find sumptuous re past upon h's flesh. All his glory has faded, and not the lowest slave of his splendid household would exchange places with him. How can men read this story and yet covet gold?

But the end is not yet. Men may honor and adorn the body of this man, but his soul they can serve no longer. Where has he gone, the one who for all these years lived in this purple-robed body, and lorded it over this mansion? He has gone to hell. Awful sentence! yet the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, and it is trne. He is now suffering the torments of the lost. Why? Because he was rich? No, for Abraham, in whose bosom Lazarus is resting so blissfully, was a rich man. Not the fact of riches, but their abuse, is where the sin lies. "The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil." This man lacked the common humanity that would have made his riches a boon from God to man. He could be content to let a wretched human being lie daily at his gate, and die with hunger and disease, while he rolled in luxury. This was inhuman, devilish, and could issue in nothing else than perdition. What a wonderful op. portunity this man had neglected. He might have been able to say, in his last days, with rich and righteous Job: "When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me; because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy."

O, had this man but made friends for himself of the mammon of unrighteousness, with what joyous greetings would be have entered into the heavenly mansions. But he knew that he had no claim upon those who dwelt in glory. Still, he offered his He is now the suppliant, but he can remember no single act of mercy upon which he can base his petition. The very messenger whom he asks Abraham to send to his relief is that same beggar whom he suffered to starve at his door. How gently does the patriarch remind him of his lifelong selfishness: "Son, remember that thou hast had thy good things, and hast abused them. Lazarus has endured his afflictions with patience. and now enters into his reward." Even if he would come to thy relief, Abraham continues, he could not, because of the vast gulf that intervenes between us and you. Language could scarcely teach more plainly the final separation of those whose earthly lives have been dominated by such opposite purposes and principles. Faith and unbelief, purity and lust, love and selfishness cannot have the same result in this life, nor the same reward in the life to come. This is the lesson the Lord would have us learn from this feature of the parable, and we need not press the details, which were adapted, doubtless, from Jewish modes of thought and forms of teachings, into hard and fast rules of the divine government concerning the future state. "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation," is the message which this part of the parable is intended to emphasize.

Another lesson the Savior would impress, now while he is opening the door of the spirit world, to give a glimpse of its conditions, and its r lation to our present life and opportunities. So he represents the rich man, when he finds that his own fate is irrevocable, as asking that Lazarus be sent back to his brothers, to warn them against coming to the same place of torment in which he is suffering; alleging that they will hear one who comes to them from the dead, although they have despised, as did he himself, the law of God given through Moses and the prophets. But Abraham declares, what all human experience confirms, the where the heart is set on evil, no messenger, en from the grave, will be heeded or obeyed. It nee no return of the dead to teach us humanity. I visible sufferings of the living cry out in thund tones, and he who is deaf to this voice of ago will listen to no whisper from beyond the gra It is not Spiritualists who claim to receive m sages from the dead, who build hospitals, orphi ages and homes for the destitute, but those w love and venerate the Word of God. TOPIC FOR NOV. 11.

A DECISION FOR CHRIST.

How often we need to be reminded that Jesus, the great Teacher, was a poet and rhetorician as well. Indeed these literary qualities are necessary to the best teaching ability. One must be able, by repetition and extra emphasis, so to drive a trath home that it cannot be forgotten, else he is not a great teacher. So Jesus sometimes stated a thing so strongly that it stung men's minds into activity and comprehension. Perhaps no one of his oriental audiences misunderstood the meaning -which is evident to any who understands literary forms and is not a literalist-of this hyper bole, that one must hate father and mother. True filial affection is undoubtedly taught by Jesus, both in word and deed. But evidently what he means to convey is that where filial duty seems to come in conflict with duty to God, the latter must have way, One must give up all, even loved ones, for the gospel's sake; and this meant much, in that day, of danger.

But what does the message mean to us to-day? The same? Perhaps not with the same intensity, though there are those who are called upon to renounce family and friends for Christ's sake, to-day, just as really as in the ancient time. But what it certainly does mean to us, is that we are under compulsion to give up aught that stands between us and our Master, no matter how dear it may be. If it is a relationship, the relationship must go. If it is a desire the desire must be crucified. If an ambition, the ambition must die. All that stands between us and him must be thrust out of the

This is the taking up of the cross. How few of us there really are that are making sacrifices! How few that know what a cross is! When David Livingstone had been for years in the heart of Africa, separated from his wife and children, when he had traveled thousands of miles through fever and danger, looking forward to sitting once more in the chimney corner by his aged father whom he had loved so well, when he had reached England, only to find that old father dead-when some one spoke to this Livingstone of the sacrifices he had made, he simply and humbly replied: "I never made a sacrifice. I am not able to discharge the debt I owe my Lord." Endeavorers, do we think any of us have made sacrifices? Possibly, possibly. Perhaps some little things we have to do and bear are harder for us than Livingstone's load was for him. But perhaps this is because we have not Livingstone's irrevocable decision for Christ. O, we do so forget our Master and our decision!

When we went into this thing, Christianity, we should have gone gravely, determinedly, forethoughtedly, counting the cost, and ready to meet even unknown difficulties for the Kingdom's sake. No man nowadays builds a house without drawing plans, and getting contractors to bid on the work. Then one must add on a heavy percentage for extras which are always coming up in the course of construction. So, no one enters into any important relation in life without carefully estimating all the difficulties and dangers. Entering the Kingdom, one should feel "No matter what comes, I propose to enter into this thing spiritedly and do all and bear all that I ought to in its behalf. Even so, Lord Jesus, having counted the cost as best we may, help us resolutely to bear our crosses, following thee."

PHILIP GERARD AN INDIVIDUAL. By Edward Amherst Ott. Published by Drake University. $1.25.

Professor Ott, of the College of Oratory of Drake University, is already well known to many of our readers as an instructor and lecturer. With this volume he makes his entrance into the field of fiction. It is an auspicious beginning. His leading character is in truth "an individual," which is more than can be said of most heroes. The novel will receive a fuller review later. Meanwhile, we give our testimony that it is good.

LITERARY NOTES

The Youth's Companion, according to its cus tom at this season, offers the remaining issues for this year free to those who subscribe for next year. We are doing good missionary work in mentioning the matter, for it is one of those papers which make for the happiness and the mental and moral health, of youth. Moreover, the grown person who cannot enjoy that sort of children's paper is the sort of grown person who doesn't enjoy [giving Christmas presents to his nephews and nieces, doesn't remember his own boyhood, and doesn't care whether the birds sing or not. If you want to know whether old age is laying his chilly finger on your spirit and whether your soul is turning gray and losing its eyesight (that is the only sort of old age to be dreaded), read a few good, lively stories for children and see if you get the same old thrill that you used to. It's a good prescription. Try it some time.

People who wish to acquaint themselves with the lives and works of the world's great artists will do well to take note of the series of small monographs which are being published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The last two, making an even half dozen which have appeared, deal with Sir Joshua Reynolds and Murillo. Each volume contains fifteen full-page illustrations and a portrait. Their very moderate price brings them within everybody's reach.

Scribner's Magazine for November contains the ast chapters of Mr. Barrie's "Tommy and Grizel." The two illustrated articles on the Paris Exposition will interest alike those who saw the original and those who did not. No more practical service can be rendered by the artist in encouraging the subtle art of appreciation than the delineation of the pictures que elements of our common environment, whether it be country or city. Several articles have been published on New York as an object of artistic admiration. The one in this issue is on "The Cross Streets of New York" and its many illustrations are signed by well-known names. Henry Norman's series on "Russla of To-day" will make a valuable book.

It is remarkable how much space is devoted in current periodical literature to Russia. Its future is a puzzling problem in politics; its present condition is a curious study in civilization; its external features abound in the unusual and the picturesque. The Atlantic Monthly has an article on "The Future of Russia," by Edmund Noble, the author of a recent and excellent book on Russia. The first chapters of "The Tory Lover" by Sarah Orne Jewitt and "Penelope's Irish Experiences," by Kate Douglas Wiggin, make the number further notable.

Magazine readers are easily caught by a popular name—especially one which has recently become popular. That was the reason why Charles Major, author of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," has been importuned by the editors ever since he made his great hit. When everything was exhausted and the demand continued, he fished up some old bear stories which he had written down years ago for the youngsters of his own family and sold them to The Ladies' Home Journal for a sum which would be a good year's salary for most of us, and they are now appearing. They are good bear stories, too. The same paper has a chapter of Clifford Howard's life of Christ under the title, "The Story of a Young Man."

The story of the Banza Manteke church in central Africa, one of the modern miracles of missions, is told by Rev. Henry Richards in the Missionary Review of the World. Other articles are on "Our Future Missionary Policy in China" and "The Crisis of the Moravian Mission in Nicaragua, due to the closing of the schools by the government."

The current number of the Living Age (weekly) reprints an important article on "The Coming Presidential Election" from the Quarterly Review (London), giving an analysis and forecast from an English point of view.

Dedication at Walker, Iowa.

The dedication of the new building of the Church of Christ took place Sunday, Oct. 28, with Bro. B. S. Denny, state secretary, in charge of the services. The building is a very pretty, modern structure and is the outgrowth of a series of meet ings, held by the district evangelist, Lawrence Wright, through whose efforts the church has been reorganized and put in good working order. Brother Wright is an untiring worker and deserves much credit for the work done at this place. He just finished a similar work at Waterloo, Ia., before coming here. He has done all the preaching, led the singing, acted as chairman of the building committee and has been foreman on the carpenter work from first to last. He seems perfectly at home either in the pulpit or at the carpenter J. T. HOUSER, Church Clerk.

Dedication at Marion, Ind.

Under the wise leadership of Bro. E. L. Frazier, their pastor, the church at Marion, Ind., has erected a comfortable and commodious tabernacle. with a beautiful auditorium, well finished and furnished, capable of seating about 800 people. It is in the very heart of the city, close to the business as well as the residence districts, and near two of the street car lines. It has in addition to the large auditorium, two class rooms that can be used as robing rooms. It is brilliantly lighted with electric lights; the cathedral glass windows, the carpet, the ceiling, etc., beautifully harmonize. In short, it is an audience room with the modern conveniences and beauty. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon their hard-working, zealous and efficient pastor, Bro. E. L. Frazier. He threw himself into the work with a zeal and energy that assured success. In season and out of season, he planned and worked and to his wise counsel and management is due much of the credit for the successful consummation of the enterprise.

Lord's day, Oct 21, was the time selected for the dedication. Leaving the great convention in Kansas City, having attended it from first to last, we went to Chicago and remained there one day, then went to Marion and remained over the Lord's day, preaching the opening sermon, raising the money to provide for the indebtedness and dedicating the house.

Bro. Ricoff, paster of the Central Christian Church at Marion, adjourned their service and with his congregation attended the dedication. Brethren were also present from a number of the surrounding congregations; so that the attend-

L. L. CARPENTER.

Dedication at Jewell City, Kan.

On Lord's day, Sept. 23, the new edifice of the Church of Christ in Jewell City was solemnly dedicated. The dedication was the crowning event of a successful departmental rally the previous week. Sister Clara H. Hazəlrigg, distinguished as the only woman evangelist of the brotherhood, conducted the rally and delivered the principal addresses on Lord's day. They were characterized by her usual depth of thought, beauty of doctrine and earnestness of delivery. One confession was received at the close of the evening service. The themes for the day were: morning, "Voices of Dawn;" evening, "By this Sign Conquer." An indebtedness of $1,600 was easily and quickly provided for, over $1,700 in pledges being secured.

The new building is a decided improvement to the city. Throughout it is furnished in golden oak, the comfortable and handsome pews of new design matching the wood-work. With its ceiling of pressed steel in blue and gold, its elegant act glass windows, acetylene lighting, inclined and beautifully carpeted floors, the interior is exceptionally beautiful and artistic. Arrangements have also been made for furnace beat. The combined seating capacity of the auditorian and lecture-room is about 500. The prospects of the church are very flattering, each department being in excellent condition. In addition to the usual departments a beneficiary system, similar to the one outlined in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of recent date, but without the insurance feature, has been in practical operation for a year and works admirably; the plan being an original one, outlined and carried into effect by the pastor.

Jewell county is pardonably proud of Mrs. Hazelrigg and the work accomplished through her efforts. The Jewell City Church is the third Church of Christ dedicated in the county this year; all modern, substantial buildings, the erection of each being directly traceable to evangel istic efforts in these separate fields by Mrs. Hazelrigg. The plans for another are well under way, nearly $1,000 having been already pledged. That the brotherhood may give Sister Hazelrigg its confidence and esteem in large massure is the earnst desire of the Disciples of Christ in Jewell county.

BLALOCK.

Sister Blalock, the beloved wife of our pastor, W. W. Blalock, departed this life Oct. 3. She was 41 years old the day of her death. She was a consecrated Christian. In all her relations she sustained a noble character. She was a model wife and mother and an earnest member of the C. W. B. M. Let us emulate her example and pray the richest blessings on the three orphan children and the bereaved husband. SARAH HOUSTON. Lamar, Mo.

DAVIS.

Died in Cauton, Mo., Sept. 9, 1900, Mrs. M. E. Davis, aged 76 years. Sister Davis was born in Kentucky Feb. 4, 1824, moved to Randolph Co., Mo., in 1831. Was married to Mr. Henderson Davis, Oct. 7, 1841. She and her husband gave their hearts and life to Christ under the preaching of Eld. Henry Thomas and for over fifty years she lived a faithful member of the body of Christ. Though dead she liveth in the hearts of the many who knew her. She leaves several sisters, one brother and many friends to mourn her departure. Her funeral was conducted by Bro. Dayis Errett and her body was laid to rest in Canton cemetery beside her husband's. She was a warm friend of the writer from his youth and with her kindred we sorrow, but not as one without hope. E. J. LAMPTON.

EMBERSON.

Mrs. Agnes Emberson, wife of R H. Emberson, of Columbia, Mo., was born near St. Joseph, Mo., April 2, 1870. and d'ed at Columbia, Mo., Sept. 15, 1900, in her thirty first year. Mrs. Emberson was a good daughter, a tender and true wife, a fond and faithful mother and a most helpful friend and faithful mother and a most helpful friend That she was all this is explained by the fact that sie was an earnest Christian. Those who mourn her most are her mother, Mrs. G. R. Kasen, of Illinois, her husband, Prof. R. H. Emberson, of Columbia, Mo., and her little ones. Their deep source calls for the largest possible sympathy of their friends. And yet they know that their loved one is at home in the Father's house and that if they be faithful they shall meet her there before many years.

POWERS.

After an illness of only six days Mrs. Julia Ann Powers (nee Colbem), wife of Dr. W. H. Powers, of Lone Dell, Mo., died Sept. 5, 1900, at 4 a. M. She was born Nov. 19, 1836, in Miller County, Mo. At the age of 16 she became a Christian and up to the time God called her she was faithful. She leaves a husband and four children, who miss her in every walk of life. W. F. HAMANN. in every walk of life.

RIDDLE.

Nathaniel Riddle was born Aug. 4, 1810, in Center Co., Pa., and died at Tedrow, O., Oct. 13, 1900, sged 90 years, two months, nine days. He 1900, aged 90 years, two months, nine days. He moved to Holmes Co., O., in 1819. Obeyed the gospel under the preaching of Elder James Porter, Dec., 1833, becoming one of the charter members of the Ripley Church. He married Sarah Armstrong Oct., 1845, and moved to Fulton Co. the same year. She died within a few months. Aug., 1847, he married Rachel Clark, who died in 1878, leaving eight children, five of whom have since died. The funeral of Bro. Riddle was held at the home of his son Oct. 15. home of his son Oct. 15.

Rebecca D. McGlasson was born in Macoupin Co., Ill., on Oct. 17, 1843. In 1872 she was married to Mr. W. H. Smith in Des Moines, Ia. removed to Denver and have lived here ever since, until on the 10th day of July, 1900, she answered the summons to come up higher and departed this life. She was a devoted and fathful Christian for many years and was more instrumental than any other, perhaps, in organizing the church at Highland, Denver, of which congregation she was a loving member for all these years. The funeral services were held in the church and were conducted by Leonard G. Thompson, State Evargelist, assisted by the writer. And so we laid her tenderly away and prayed God that he might give to the broken-hearted companion of hers, who still remains, sufficient of his grace and love and H. A. DAVIS.

The Borse Fair.

By Rosa Bonbeur.

It is a revelation. Every time you look at it you see something new. Under a beautiful morning sky and at the edge of a young grove, with a tower in the rear, all fresh as the day, prance the splendid Percherons—twenty-two in all. On an eminence to the right are the spectators and buyers, some pointing, as if making selections, and all wearing expressions pleased in the extreme. The parade circles toward them. The coloring is superb. You can fairly see the horses snort as they chafe their bits and rear up. The sleek black in a plunging position keeps its rider busy, and in behavior is in contrast to that of the submissive brown to his right.

A team of powerful whites tests the strength of the man in the saddle as they strive to catch the lead. Far in the rear is a vicious fellow with head well up and ears back, struggling with two lusty keepers. The most eloquent thing about the horse is his ears—you can read his will in the position he holds his ears. The grooms, some mounted, others hanging to the guy halters, barely escaping death under the heavy hoofs, are so many Herculeses, with brawny arms, with white-and-blue blouses. These, with the onlookers, make forty-two men shown on the canvas. The lights and shadows of the picture are features not least noted by convoisseurs.

Such is the character of the picture that has produced the sensation of the century in art circles. The picture was first exhibited in the Paris Salon, and in 1855 formed the chief attraction in the French exhibit of pictures in London. It was brought to this country in 1857 by W. R. Wright, of Weehawken, and sold to A. T. Stewart for $50,000. At the Stewart sale in March, 1877, it was the chief center of interest, and was bought for $55,000 on March 25 by Samuel P. Avery for Cornelius Vanderbilt, who the next day presented it to the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Book Notes.

The new edition of "Christian Science Dissected" is now ready for delivery. This book is having a most gratifying sale. It is a sharp, concise, plain, practical dissection of the doctrines and dogmas of Mary Baker Eddy and her followers—the best known antidote for that form of insanity known as "Christian Science." It is just the thing to put into the hands of one who has become inoculated with the Eddy poison. The book is unanswerable, for the author quotes from the writings of Mrs. Eddy and her leading disciples, and condemns them on their own testimony. Price, 25 cents.

Those of our readers who have secured a copy of our new General Catalogue—and those who have not should do so at once—have perhaps already noted the reduction in price of the "Saturday Talk Series of Childhood," by Laura Gerold Craig. The six books which make this set are unsurpassed as books for children. The author thoroughly understands the mental wants of the child. The child likes best of all, stories, tales of real men and women. These stories are presented in such an attractive manner that the child will retain them through life. The six volumes are as follows:

Little Presidents. Little Orators.
Little Kings. Little Generals.
Little Queens. Little Statesmen.

The volumes are handsomely printed and bound, and are illustrated. The former price of 50 cents per volume, or $2.50 for the set, has been reduced to 40 cents per volume, or $2.00 for the six volumes.

Our special offers of the "Blographical and Historical Library" and the "Home Library" have now expired. They were taken advantage of by a great many. In fact, we received more orders for the sets than we had anticipated. It being thus demonstrated that our patrons appreciate the advantage of purchasing books in sets, we make, elsewhere in this issue, the offer of "The Excelsior Library"—Twelve Volum's for Five Dollars. This offer will hold good until January 1, thus giving sufficient time for all who wish this set to arrange to secure it. This set will also be included in our "Special Christmas Catalogue," which will appear the latter part of November.

"The Lord's Supper," by N. J. Aylsworth, is a discussion of the ordinance commemorative of the death of the Master, particularly as to the frequency of its observance. Price, 25 cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The election returns Wednesday morning indicate the election of M Kinley and Roosevelt by a larger majority than four years ago. Of the so called doubtful states, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia and Kansas are in the Republican column. Kentucky is Democratic by a narrow margin; Beckham, Democratic candidates for Governor, ran behind his ticket. Nebraska's electoral vote is doubtless Democratic, but she has elected a Republican legislature, which wil sh rtly choose two United States Senators. In general the decreased emphasis on free silver and imperialism as an issue gave Democratic gains in the East, but not enough to carry any hitherto Republican state; while the same causes led to Republican g ins in the Middle and Western states, some of which (Kansas and South Dakota) gave McKinley the electoral votes which went for Bryan in 1896. The next Congress will be Republican in both branches. The vote on the Constitutional Amendments in Missouri assures the St. Louis World's Fair in 1903.

It is difficult, in a time of ante election excitement, to bear in mind the fact that this country has already lived through several unfortunate political experiments which, though they have for a time interfered with our prosperity, have endowed us with a rich heritage of experience upon some points. There is scarcely anything which can be done by the popular will, that cannot also be undone when the public mind comes to see the way of political wisdom more perfectly. It is the burnt child who dreads the fire, and there are very likely several varieties of political fire which we will never learn suffic ently to dread until we have burnt our fingers in them. This dies not mean that it makes no difference how the election goes. It only means that it is foolish to consider that the whole moral order of the universe will be thrown into irrevocable chaos, or the appointed destiny of our nation thwarted, by the election or defeat of Mr. Bryan, Mr. McKinley or Mr. Wooley.

Mr. Croker's frank advice to his fellowpartisans of New York to remain at the polls on election day until they close, then count Democratic noses and, if the announced result of the ballot did not tally with their count, take possession of the polling places by force and throw those in charge of the returns into the street, is a very remarkable utterance to be made by such an astute politician. It is not often that one whose political methods are so dark and devious that his right hand can scarcely discover what his left hand is doing, indulges in such a burst of confidence with the general public. The ballotboxes of New York state are in no special danger of being stuffed. The election law of that state provides all reasonable safe-guards against ballotstuffing and ample facilities for punishing the crime if it is committed. Such a pronunciamento as that of Mr. Croker, which is approved by Senator Jones, is nothing less than an incitement to lawlessness in a most dangerous direction. If any Re publican leader should give this same advice in Kentucky, where there is at present no legal safe-guard to the purity of the ballot, he wou'd fall under the same condemnation as an advocate of one of the most dangerous forms of anarchy.

The Philippine Commission, under the presidency of Judge Taft, has prepared and enacted a civil service law for the Philippine Islands. The effect of this law will be to reduce the power of the military authorities in making appointments, and to make the occupancy of a very large proportion of the civil offices dependent upon competitive examination. Examinations are to be held in Manila, Iloilo and Cebu and in the United States, and, other things being equal, the preference is to be given to native Filipinos. This is another step toward that establishment of a stable form of government which all parties admit to be the immediate duty of the United States in the Philippines.

The recent reorganization of the British cabinet involved some changes which created surprise on both sides of the water. Lord Salisbury has been carrying too heavy a load, in his dual capacity of prime minister and Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He retains the premiership and with reluctance turns over the foreign portfolio to Lord Lansdowne, former Secretary for War. This promotion for Lansdowne is a very bold act on the part of the administration for, as Secretary for War, he was the natural object of the criticisms which were passed upon the unpreparedness of the British army at the outbreak of the war in South Africa. The unpopularity of Lansdowne, on account of the disasters with which the campaign opened, was far more widespread than the unpopularity of Chamberlain as the chief advocate of the war. The result of the elections was a popular approval of the administration and a vindication of Mr. Chamberlain, but that did not carry with it the approval of the disorganized condition of the army when it entered upon the war. Mr. Brodrick succeeds to the war portfolio, instead of Mr. Wyndham, whose eloquent defense of the South African war when he was under secretary for war gave rise to an expectation that he would be advanced to the headship of this department. Instead of this, Mr. Wyndham becomes secretary for Ireland. The promotion of the Earl of Selborne from under secretary in the colonial office to First Lord of the Admiralty, which is in honor the third place in the cabinet, is surprising, especially in view of the fact that the Earl has no experience in naval affairs. Mr. Chamberlain remains secretary for the Colonies.

A new House of Commons in the Canadian Parliament is being elected on Wednesday of this week. It is noted that the nominations have brought forward fewer labor candidates than usual, and more independents. The drift of the Liberal party from its position as the advocate of free trade has forced the more ardent advocates of that doctrine into the support of independent candidates. There is at present no important issue involved in the fight between the two parties. They are, indeed, trying to "crowd each other off of the same platform." In some quarters the Conservatives are denouncing the present Liberal administration, with Sir Wilfred Laurier at its head, because it sent troops to the war in South Africa. In other districts, where the war is popular, the administration is criticized for not sending troops more promptly. Altogether, it is a bitter struggle, but one which deals with personalities rather than with principles.

The movement for Christian union has been advanced by the union of two branches of Scotch Presbyterianism. The Presbyterian Church in Scotland has lent itself with singular aptitude to division and subdivision, until a graphic representation of its ramifications would resemble a family tree for several generations. The seventeenth century was its time of heroic struggle against Stuart persecution. The eighteenth and early nineteenth century was its age of division and lethargy. Successive bodies of Seceders left the main body and themselves split into still smaller groups. It will be remembered that Thomas Campbell's first practical effort toward Christian unity in Pennsylvania was an attempt to establish brotherly intercourse between the "Burgher Seceder Presbyterians" and the "Anti-Burgher Seceder Presbyterians." Early in the present century, a fresh secession from the main body (the established church of Scotland) produced the Free Church. But the spirit of unity was already beginning to work. Two of the earlier seceding bodies joined in the United Presbyterian Church. And now, by the action of a joint meeting of the Free Church assembly and the United Presbyterian Synod in Edinburg, Oct. 30, the United Free Church of Scotland has been formed. The occasion was celebrated with much rejoicing in Scotland.

The Chicago drainage canal is still only an experiment, according to the report of Gen. Wilson, chief of engineers of the United States Army. In his official report, lately made public, his statements in regard to it are very cautious and he is evidently of the opinion that Chicago's gain may very likely involve loss to some other communities. He "The question of drawing water from Lake Michigan through the Chicago River and the drainage canal in the interest the drainage system of Chicago is one of great importance to that city and district, but there are also questions involved of equally great inportance to the lake navigation interests both of the United States and Canada. It is very probable that all these in erests cannot be fully satisfied, and that there must be a compromise effected. The question has been temporarily settled by the granting of a temporary permit, which can only be considered as a permit to experiment so long as no serious results follow. It would appear that consideration by Congress of the questions involved is of the utmost importance, with a view of reaching an ultimate settlement as soon as practicable. The probable effect on the lake levels cannot be determined." It will not be forgotten that the temporary opening of the canal was a hasty and somewhat tricky proceeding, accomplished in the night, as it were, to avoid legal restraint, and even yet there has never been any sufficiently thorough investigation into its effect on the rivers into which it flows.

The reports of the census bureau reveal some interesting facts in regard to the growth of cities in this country. Those who consider the tide of population which flows from the country to the city a symptom of disordered social or economic conditions will note with satisfaction that during the past decade the increase in city population has been less, both in per cent. and absolutely, than during the preceding decade. There are 159 cities in the United States with more than twenty-five thousand inhabitants. From 1880 to 1890 these cities gained only a fraction less than fifty per cent. From 1890 to 1900 they gained only thirty-two and a half per cent. But the growth of the larger cities has gone steadily on, for the last three census reports, 1880. 1890 and 1900, show the number of cities having over a hundred thousand inhabitants to be, respectively, 20, 28 and 38. Twelve states and territories have no city of twenty-five thousand. In Nebraska alone has the urban population suffered an actual decrease in the past decade.

The giving of a large order for railway materials in South Africa to American firms was such a surprising event, to some at least, that it has taken some time for it to gain currency as an actual fact. But, whether the British steel makers like it or not, it is unquestionably true this time, as it has been often before, that American makers have captured the order. Mr. Wyndham, late under secretary of the British War Office, recently characterized the British markets as "the slowest and most expensive," and said that they must turn out their goods quicker and cheaper if they wished to keep their share of the South African trade. The order for railway trucks, which has lately been placed in American hands, could probably not have been filled in less than a year, if sent through the usual official channels. British firms offered to do the work in seven menths, American bidders promised the goods in three months and thirty per cent. cheaper. Still, one-third of the order was given to the British for the sake of encouraging home industry. It is further reported, by so reliable authority as Dun's Review, that the British government has placed in this country orders for half a million dollars worth of steel viadact work for the Uganda railways.

Another secular tribute to the personal worth and efficiency of the American missionaries in China, is found in the words of thanks of Mr. Conger, American representative at Pekin, to the missionaries who were in the seige. Mr. Conger evidently does not think that the trouble is all due to them as some misguided ones have asserted. He writes as follows:

Besieged Ameri an Missionaries, one and all of you, so providentially saved from certain massacre, I desire in this hour of deliverance to express what I know to be the universal sentiment of our diplomatic corps, sincere appreciation of and profound gratitude for ine-timable help which the native Christians under you have rendered towards our preservation.

Without your intelligent and successful planning and the uncomplaining execution of the Chinese, I believe our salvation would have been impossible. By your courteous consideration of me and your continued patience under most trying occasions, I have been most deeply touched, and for it all I thank you most heartily.

I hope and believe that in God's unerring plan your sacrifices and danger will bear rich fruit in a material and spiritual welfare of people to whom you have so nobly devoted your lives and work. Assuring you of my personal respect and gratitude, very sincerely yours, E. H. Conger.

It is remarkable, too, how many people who were more or less seriously menaced by the dangers of the Chinese uprising have suddenly concluded that there is a God who has a hand in history.

RELATION OF CHURCH AND STATE IN EDUCATION.

It has long been a matter of congratulation among Americans that in this country we have no uni)n of Church and State, as in most of the nations of the Old World. Our theory of civil government gives it no authority to say what creed, or what form of worship or of ecclesiastical government the people must accept, on pain of being regarded as "dissenters," nor has the State, according to our way of thinking, any right to maintain any ecclesiastical establishment on the plea that religion is essential to the stability of the government. It is believed by the vast majority of the people of this country that religion does sustain a very important relation to good government and to social order; but they also believe that religion does its best work where it is unfettered by State authority, and unaided by state patronage.

While we believe this view of the relation of the Church and State to be the true one, and that its wisdom has been vindicated by experience, it is obvious that, since both the Church and the State are divine appointments to promote human welfare, there is a very close relation between them. They may co-operate, without being united, in promoting their common end in their respective spheres. It is an abnormal and anomalous state of things when they antag onize each other or work at cross purposes When this is the case it follows that either the Church or the State has departed from its true function as a conservator of the public weal. Whenever the Church has be come so corrupt as to foster and encourage practices which are in violation of good gov ernment, it ceases to be a true representa tive of religion and needs reforming. When ever the State lends its sanction to customs and practices which are immoral and there fore opposed to the welfare of the peoplepractices which tend to neutralize the in fluence and work of the Church-then th State needs reforming.

Leaving the reader now to make the ap plication of this principle to existing condi tions in Church and State, we wish to speal of the relation of these two agencies of Goo for the government of men, in the sphere of education. In this country both the Church and the State are engaged in the work o education. Are we to regard either one a an interloper in a field where it has no legit imate place, or are they both right in assum ing that they have some obligations to mee in this sphere of life? The State answer that in a government where the people rul public education is a necessity, and it pro vides for it by a public school system which is the pride of our country. The apex o this system is the State University; its bas the common school. The Church, availing itself of the tremendous aid thus afforde indirectly by the State, has claimed its righ and duty to build on this foundation such superstructure of higher learning as it ha been able to provide in colleges and univer sities whose curricula include some studie of a religious and theological characte which could not be taught in State institutions. Above all, the Church has sought to imbue her colleges and universities with a religious atmosphere in which the moral and religious nature of the students will be developed. This is particularly true of the smaller colleges, built and sustained by the various religious bodies. It has been the misfortune, too, of some of these colleges to be controlled by an intensely denominational spirit, hardly consistent with the liberalizing influence of the highest and best learning. But in spite of this defect, which is steadily diminishing, these colleges have wrought a work for the Church and for the State which neither could have dispensed with without great loss; just as the State Universities, in spite of the unfriendly spirit toward religion which has occasionally been manifested by some of their teachers, have, on the whole, rendered a service which has been vastly helpful to society on both its civic and religious side.

It would appear, then, that both the Church and the State, being alike dependent upon education for their equipment to render efficient service to the people, are rightly engaged in the work of educating the young. It is worse than useless, it is folly, for either to quarrel with the other, and regard itself as able to meet the whole deman i for education. The Church is limited by its financial ability and the State by constitutional provisions, so that neither alone can provide that all sided and thorough training which our complex civilization makes necessary. It is the part of wisdom to recognize this fact and plan accordingly. The State Universities are here as a permanent part of our educational system. They offer certain advantages which command an increasing patronage, including a large percentage from each of the religious bodies. It is the least the Church can afford to do for them to establish beside them Bible Chairs, both to impart some general knowledge of biblical literature and to throw around the students such religious influence as will tend to hold then to morality and to the Church. The value to religion of having some thoroughly capable teacher of the Bible come in contact with many of the brightest young minds of the country to impress them with the claims of Christ, is too obvious to need argument. No Church which has an eye to religious strategy will neglect this work.

On the other hand the Church may well feel, as it seems to us, that it owes much more to the cause of Christian education than it can render by supplementing the studies taught in State Universities with biblical instruction, and that it must establish institutions of its own, whose spirit shall be not less broad than that of State Universities, but broader, including religion, queen of the heart, and theology, queen of the sciences, and having for their cornerstone the Bible and the Christ of the Bible. These institutions need not be hampered, as State institutions are, but be free to teach all truth esssential to the building of the highest and noblest manhood and womanhond

This, the Disciples of Christ, along with other religious bodies, are seeking to do. We have made many blunders in our blind zeal for education, but we are learning wisdom by Recent action looks toward a experience. more intelligent direction of our energies and zeal in behalf of Christian learning. The educational skies are brightening. We are making no war on state institutions nor on Bible Chairs in connection therewith, but will thank God for all the good they are doing and strive to help them be more useful. But we shall go forward, as God may give us light and strength, to build up some institutions of our own, whose sole reason for their being will be the enthronement of Christ in every domain of human thought and activity.

THE WISE CHOICE OF THE YOUNG MAN MOSES.

(Heb. 11:24-27; Deut. 34:10-12.)

CENTRAL TRUTH: —It is better to choose the service of God, with poverty, than the pleasures of sin, though associated with royalty and wealth.

It was a decisive moment in the history of the young man Moses, when he decided to turn his back upon the Egyptian court, with all its luxury, its leisure, its sinful indulgences, and identify himself with an enslaved people poor, despised, oppressed, but the people of God. Reared in the palace of the Pharaohs, educated in all the learning of Egypt, the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter-what might he not have aspired to in the way of earthly honors and emoluments? There was that in him, however, which enabled him to discern between the superficial and temporary pleasures of sin and the enduring honor of God. This was the power of faith. Nothing else could have enabled this young man to make such a choice.

How many young men, reared in more religious surroundings than Moses and with far less prospect of worldly renown and wealth, have turned away from the service of God and from association with His people. identify themselves with seekers of wealth, and of pleasure, and of honor. and have become lost to themselves, to their fellowmen and to God. They lack this power of faith which is able to discern between the temporal and the eternal, the material and the spiritual, the sinful and the righteous. Even to-day, any young man having the earthly prospects which Moses had who should turn away from them to identify himself with a righteous cause and with the people of God, even though they be enslaved, would probably be regarded as a fanatic, lacking wisdom and prudence.

But who that reads that splendid history of Moses in the light of history and sees what a leading place he holds in the history of the world's best jurisprudence and of religion, doubts the wisdom of his cnoice? Who now cares for the Pharaohs, except as historical curiosities? For their thought about law or religion, so far as they had any, is either unknown or without any influence on the thought of to-day, but Moses from his "sceptered urn" is still a potent factor in molding the thought and life of mankind.

Let us see what the inspired record says as to the place which Moses attained because of his choice. Long after the death of Moses an unknown writer, whose words constitute the closing part of the Pentateuch, "And there hath not arisen a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and the wonders, which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Ezypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, and in all the mighty hand, and in all the great terror, which Moses wrought in the sight of all Israel." Such is the calm and deliberate testimony of one who looks back upon the history of Moses and upon the history of Israel since his day as to his place among the great prophets of the Hebrews.

It is easy for us to see the wisdom of the choice which Moses made, in the light of history, but it is not always so easy to understand that it is wise for us to deny ourselves sinful pleasures and indulgences and to choose the service of God, even though the choice involves hardship, poverty, persecution. But yet this is the lesson which the history of Moses teaches us. It is always wise to turn away from the pleasures of sin, no matter how strongly they appeal to our senses, no matter what earthly honors and emoluments are associated with them, to walk in the path of righteousness, which is the path of duty.

We are making choices every day. We are choosing between the material and the spiritual, between the service of God and the service of Satan. Are our choices wise? Are we able to endure as seeing him who is invisible, looking for our reward hereafter? To such a life does the example of Moses, and all the teaching of God's word, call us.

PRAYER.

O thou God of all truth and grace, who calleth men away from sin, whose wages is death, to righteousness, whose end is life eternal, we thank Thee for the power f faith, by which we are enabled to choose identification with Thy people and with Thy cause, rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Help the young especially, we bessech Thee, to make wise choices, that all the strength of their manhood and womanhood may be devoted to the cause of righteousness and that they may thus escape the corruption that is in the world through lust, becoming partakers of the divine nature and of the divine glory through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

When the year is in its yellowing time and Nature becomes a study in old gold, as Kenneth Grahame would say, who but a prisoner of his craft would forego the pleasure of being out-of-doors? But even prisoners sometimes make their escape, or are let at large on their good behavior under pledge to return to captivity. And so it has come to pass that "we are tenting to-night on the old camp ground —," that is, we are back at Macatawa for a few days, sheltering in Edgewood-on-the-Lake and closing it up for the winter. How strange and still the place appears! A few workmen are busy with improvements down about the dock, and a few new cottages are going up in the woods, but otherwise all is silent, save the thunder of the waves on the shore, the sighing of the autumn winds through the trees, and the falling of acorns and nuts upon the roofs of cottages and upon the walks. A stiff autumnal gale is blowing to-day from the west, and the beach is resounding with the succession of foaming billows that break upon it, while the whole front of the lake, from the second bar to the shore, looks like a white sheet of foam in the distance. The old lake has been making some inroads on the shore-line since we left here, washing out the lake-front walk, in some places, as if it were seeking to pull down these sand hills which the winds of centuries and millenniums have reared. It is reassuring, however, to remember that when Abraham migrated westward from Chaldea, and when Job was watching the course of Arcturus and of the Pleiades, this old lake, unseen, it may have been, by human eyes, and certainly by other than savage eyes, was then, as now, given to these seasons of rage and fury as often as old Boreas let loose his winds upon it. If, in all this lapse of time, it has not deluged the land, nor torn down these hills, it is not likely to do so in the future.

If we call this place beautiful in the summer, we must call it gorgeous now in the glory of its autumnal robes. To walk through its deep, silent woods is to tread upon a carpet more gorgeous in its colors, and more harmonious in its blending of hues and tints, than can be found in the palaces of kings, while the aisles through the trees. roofed and carpeted in gold, and saffron, and crimson, excel in grandeur and sublimity those of the cathedrals of the Old World. To sit alone upon the trunk of some fallen tree is to be rapt in a silence so profound as to fill the soul with awe and reverence. How welcome to many a weary soul would such a season of silence be in some of our churches before the public worship is begun! There are few people, comparatively, it would seem, that know the value of silence as an opportunity for the soul to commune with God and to be taught of God. One who fears silence and solitude occasionally is one who is not on good terms with God and with his higher selfhood. There is nothing, it seems to us, which the American people, especially, need to learn more than to be still in the presence of God, and to open their hearts before His all-seeing eyes and to open their eyes to His all-loving heart. Too much solitude would not be good for man, as he is a social being and loves the face of his fellowmen, but a little solitude, a few moments of reverential silence in each day, would be vastly beneficial in detecting evil tendencies, in correcting faults in our lives, and in promot ng that equipoise so essential to a stable character.

Last night heavy dark clouds rolled up from the west and southwest and the wind blew a gale all through the night, and the rain beat a tattoo upon the roof and window. To-day the gale continues but the clouds have drifted away, leaving a clear blue sky and the blue lake churned into foam along the shore. The leaves are falling rapidly to-day and the air is full of them as they sift down from the boughs of the trees which they have adorned, to carpet the earth. Cottages on neighboring hill-tops seem to be brought nearer together since the trees have been denuded of a part of their foliage, and new vistas of lake upon either side of the peninsula come to view from the summits of the hills. While strolling through the woods with a gun, on a little hunting expedition, we reached the summit of a hill from which Lake Michigan on the west, as far as the eye could reach, lay before us, or rather rolled in majesty, while on the east, Macatawa Bay nestled quietly under the shelter of the hills, and Black Lake stretched away in the distance to Holland, with all its bays and sinuosities of shore line clearly marked in the transparent atmos phere. We could note the different favorite fishing points in the lake, but no fishermen were visible and no sound of oar or shout of lucky angler disturbed the quiet of the scene. Standing here on this dividing summit between the two lakes, with the autumn leaves falling thick about us, it was easy to go back in imagination to the period, not far remote in the past, when the Red Men of the forest were lords of these lakes and woods, when they fished in its waters and hunted through its primeval forests. But they belonged to a vanishing race and have given place here, as elsewhere, to the aggressiveness of the white man, who sees in this combination of hills, and lakes, and canons, and woods, an almost ideal place for those who are weary with the world's strife, its work and its worry, to come for a season of rest and communion with Nature and Nature's God.

We have referred to improvements about the Macatawa dock. These include a proad granitoid walk from the dock to the hotel and beyond westward to Lake Michigan. A large and commodious arcade, as it might be termed, is going up between where the old grocery store stood and the hotel, affording room for the various departments of business below, and rooms above to be fitted up as living rooms. Men are engaged in haul ng the thick, black loam from the valley running into Black Lake where the wood and wagon yard is located, and covering the sand between the hotel and the dock preparatory to its being sown in grass. These improvements will add much to the appearance of the Park, especially to that part of it which visitors see first on arriving. Two new and stately cottages are going up on Cedar Walk, on the south side and east of the cottages of Haley and Burgess. This seems to be the popular "walk" of the Park, and cottages are climbing higher along the ridge-way on the south each year, and will probably continue to do so until they reach "Philosophy Hall" at the summit of the ridge. As we passed between "Old Virginia" and "Old Khintuck," we called the names of Tyler and Haley, as we used to in passing, but received no response except the echo of our own voice. We believe that in the future this place will become quite a popu'ar autumn resort as well as summer resort for those who have the power to choose their time of vacation, and who prefer the splendors of autumn to the beauty of summer. Besides those who remain at the Park, we met only three of the resorters whom we had been accustoned to see there, L. C. Stow and wife, of Grand Rapids, with whom we had a visit all too brief, and Jasper S. Hughes, who, in returning from a prohibition campaign in Michigan, passed by to take a glance at his "Nutshell" on the knoll, and who, of course, was bubbling over with enthusiasm for Woolley, prohibition and sober America. And now we must depart The curtains are drawn, the shutters are on the doors and wind) ws of Eige vood on the-Lake, and we leave it to the squirrels and birds until summer comes again.

Questions and Hnswers.

In the Christian Evangelist of Oct. 11, in answer to a question by M. M. S., I notice the following:

"We think the Holy Spirit does, in addition to the testimony through the Word, give to the obedient believer a consciousness of peace and joy and love, which the believer is able to recognize as the fruit of the Spirit. In this way he is assured of his relationship to God in a way which would not be possible on testimony wholly external to himself."

Icannot see how the obedient believer can possess a consciousness of "peace and joy and love, which he is able to recognize as the fruit of the Spirit," and "in this way be assured of his relationship to God," except as this consciousness comes to him by the revelations of apostles and prophets. How can he have consciousness in this matter otherwise?

New York City. M. C. Tiers.

Our venerable brother has probably read into our answer something that we did not put there There was nothing in our answer to indicate that the knowledge which the believer has, that the peace, joy and love whi h he experiences as the result of the Holy Spirit dwelling in him did not come from the revelation of the apostles and prophets of the New Testament. What we were saying was, that there must be in the heart the consciousness of these inward experiences in order to the highest possible certitude that we are children of God. Consciousness has to do directly with that which takes place in one's own mind and heart. It is not in the power of any external revelation to testify as to the existence of these internal experiences in any given individual. Here each man's own consciousness is the only valid witness. But no one is able to have this consciousness of the fruit of the Spirit within him, except as a result of the Holy Spirit working in him. This is what the apostle John means when he says: "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in bim." It is this internal witness in co-operation with the external testimony of God's word that gives us assurance of our relationship to God as his obedient children.

I stated the other day in the presence of some riends that there was not a single command in the New Testament to keep the "Sabbath" holy; that every one of the Ten Commandments was re-enacted in the New Testament except the Fourth, Was I correct?

The statement without further explanation would probably be misleading. While it is true that the Fourth Commandment is not re-enacted in the New Testament, we do have the principle underlying it, perhaps, in the observance by the apostles and first Christians of the first day of the week. The underlying principle of both these days is the consecration of one day out of seven to purely religious uses. In the Lord's day, or the first day of the week, we have the survival of that which was vital and enduring in the Sabbath, or Seventh day of the Mosaic institution. There is a tendency, we think, to neglect the proper observance of the Lord's day even on the part of many Christians. Nothing should be said or done to encourage such laxity. What our querist meant by his remark was, no doubt, substantially true, but unless it was guarded or further elaborated, it might easily have been misconstrued as a denial of any authority for the observance of what many people term the "Christian Sabbath." We believe that the authority for observing the Lord's day does not rest in Moses but in Christ, and that it has reference to the resurrection of Christ on the first day of the week.

1. Suppose a little church in Missouri should ordain a man as an evangelist and that he should come to the Territory, and because of irregularities in his conduct, the brethren should look him up, and as the result of their investigation his name should be dropped from our Territorial directory as a Christian minister: Would he still have the right to work on and legally organize Christian churches, baptize believers and ordain elders and deacons?

2. I notice in the Christian-Evangelist that many writers use the names Church of Christ and Christian Church interchangeably as though they are one and the same organization. Please state what, if any, difference exists between them?

3. How long should a new congregation be held in an unorganized condition ordinarily before being officered with elders and deacons? R. S. Smedly.

1. The mere fact of the preacher's name being left off of a directory, either territorial or state, would have nothing to do with his right to act as a minister of the gospel. If he has been found unworthy of the office of a minister, the fact should be reported to the congregation which ordained him, and if it fails to revoke his ordination, the ministers in any given state or territory where he is acting would have the right, after having found him unworthy by proper investigation, to warn the churches against him. He would have no moral or religious right to continue his work as a minister after such decision had been reached by his brethren.

- 2. The names, Church of Christ and Christian Church, are, of course, used interchangeably and refer to the same body. A few factionists attempt to use the name, Church of Christ, in a narrow, restricted sense, referring to congregations which hold certain peculiar notions, but no such distinction is recognized by our representative preachers and writers
- 3. Until such time as it has within its membership persons who are capable of filling the offices of elder and deacon.

1. What authority is there in the New Testament for the observance of Sunday (Lord's day) instead of the Sabbath as formerly?

2. Please give reference to the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal" in the New Testament. It is contended by a party here that there is no direct mention of this command-nent in the New Testament.

An Old Subscriber.

We have the example of the apostles, who, beginning with the very day of Christ's resurrection, were accustomed to meet on that day. Whether they acted under any direct intimation of Christ, or under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in meeting on that day, may be an open question, but it is extremely improbable that without such intimation or guidance they would have allowed the first day of the week to supercede the seventh as the day of assembly and worship. We learn from Acts 20:7 that it was the custom of the church at Troas to meet on the first day of the week for the breaking of bread. We learn from contemporaneous history also that the first Christians were accustomed to meet on this day for that purpose. We have the example, therefore, of the apostles and of the early church as precedent for the observance of this day.

2. The man who would express any doubt as to the prohibition of stealing in the New Testament would give strong evidence of having never read it. Aside from such direct references as "Let him that stole steal no more," "Provide things honestly in the sight of all men," the whole book inculcates those principles which are in direct antagonism, not only to stealing, but to every species of dishonesty. It is confessedly the highest ethical s'andard which the world has any knowledge of.

Convention Echoes.

One of the greatest advantages of the convention is the inspiration that it gives to the work and the workers. We depend upon our newspapers for accurate information, but we go to our conventions for inspiration. Any one in his own field toiling alone and not thinking of others might become easily discouraged, but when we stand side by side with five thousand brethren, full of enthusiasm for the work and with a determination that God's cause shall be greatly advanced, it inspires every heart. We realize that in Israel there are seventy times seven thousand that have not bowed the knee to Baal, and that God's cause is moving constantly forward. Our conventions must become more and more inspirational; the details must be left more and more to committees. but the great multitude of people must inspire one another to do great works in the service of BENJ L. SMITH.

I am impressed at every annual convention with glad signs of the passing of the age of the "tithing of anise and cummin." This transition was more apparent in Kansas City than ever before. We are still as loyal to minute obedience, but are getting a perspective for adjusting things according to their inherent emphasis. While we have found that these weightier matters of the lawjustice and mercy and faith-are the real fruit of the Christian life, yet we have not left the others und ne-the more formal. We are learning that "obedience to the gospel" includes the Christian graces and going into all the world, as much as baptism-the difference being that one is the single obedience of the moment, the other a state of continued obedience.

ALBERT BUXTON.

The magnitude of our National Conventions; the world wide interests represented; the healthy growth shown by all reports; the touching appeals from all quarters for enlargement, the deep spirit of earnestness and fellowship and, perhaps, most of all, our unique and marvelous women's work, combine to indicate the superior influence among men of the pure gospel and the great power and responsibility that have come to us, as a religious people. S. C. SLAYTON.

Des Moines, Ia.

The meeting of the great and good and mingling with them was my first joy at our conventions. When Live Jameson in 1883 in Cincinnati, sang "One by One," my wife wept and said: "If I get nothing more I'm paid for coming." We might never have seen this friend of her father's but for the convention. 'Iis a benediction to any former student of Bethany to shake the hand of Charles Louis Loos. A I want to get a kind word from Chas. Carlton. At a convention at Austin, I introduced Bro. Bently to Geo. Culbertson. Bently of China said: "When I saw your victory over the prize fight, which I read in London, I threw up my cap, and here it goes to you as our governor." S. W. CRUTCHER.

- 1. The C. W. B. M. sisters had voices, knew how to use them and took time to commit their addresses so they could deliver them with power.
- 2. The poem on "Boggess' Ride" ought to be published and recited in every church.
- 3. The report of J. B. Haston's advertisement in the Galveston dailies after the storm asking that if there were any members of the Christian church alive they meet him at the church next day, suggests that there are multitudes in the world alive physically, but spiritually dead, who do not appreciate the privilege of meeting Christ in the public assembly.

Onawa, Ia. Oct. 26, 1900.

The convention was one of the best, food for the mind soul and spirit, a great soul-uplifting, a regular feast day and night. But with all its joy and help to the believing Disciple, there were some sad features, namely not one word said, not one effort to send the gospel of the Son of God into the great territory of 300,000 white people, besides 150,000 Indians. Just in 12 hours' ride from Kansas City a field ripe unto the harvest and nothing said or done. Are not the souls of these people as precious in the eyes of God as the souls of men in India, China, Cuba, Philippine Issouls of men 10 11012, Send, lands? Send us help, is our cry.

MODERN CHARITY METHODS.

W. W. HOPKINS.

Since we have the dependent poor on our hands to be cared for, it is probably best to go about the work in the wisest way. The right thing to do would be to correct a system of civilization the chief characteristic of which is the production of millionaires upon the one side and paupers upon the other, but since men refuse to tolerate the appearance of reforms in this direction the next best thing to do is to take up the task as calmly and as generously as the circumstances will permit. It is with some degree of pleasure, therefore, that we refer to the Provident Association of this city as an institution of charity for the relief of the helpless and the dependent poor so common to our large cities. What is of particular interest to us about this Association is not its purpose so much as its methods, which tend toward the elimination of poverty. There are some methods of charity which tend toward the increase of pauperism; they are sentimental and religious enough, but they are unnatural, unwise, and non-scientific. The Provident Association of St. Louis is trying to eliminate the dangerous elements in charity work by its more scientific methods. An inspection of its plant and methods of work will convince any one that charity can and should be systematized. The day of indiscriminate giving is passing and a better method succeeding.

While the Provident Association is purely a charitable institution an inspection of its methods and agencies leaves the impression of a well organized industrial school. In the first place they have a plant costing more than $50,000, designed and adapted to the work for which it exists. This cost was provided for by R. M. Scruggs, one of St. Louis' most successful merchants and prominent citizens. The central office, at 1623 Washington Ave., is a new building designed upon the most approved methods and highest ideals, the result chiefly of investigations made by W. H. McClain, its present business manager.

In the general plan of this Association pauperism, the idea of getting something for nothing, is kept in the background and the spirit of self-help and independence proninently kept at the front. As a rule the worthy poor do not like to ask for assistance of this kind. On the other hand the most persistent and continuous beggars are the least worthy. One of the first duties of the Provident Association, therefore, is to weed out and discourage professional tramps and encourage and assist the worthy unfortunate and helpless poor. To do this the Provident Association maintains a very efficient and practical system of investigation. "No help except in emergency cases without investigation" is one of the first fundamentals of this Association. And in this particular field they have collected and systematically filed in their office for reference over one hundred thousand cases. These files are accessible for churches, lodges or individuals who may wish to know about any particular person for the purpose of detecting fraud or assisting the worthy poor.

To destroy the idea of dependent pauperism, the Provident Association has inaugurated numerous industrial agencies through which persons in need of help may become instrumental in relieving their own wants and at the same time minister to the wants of others. These agencies are a sewing room, a cooking school, a nursery, a trained nurse department, a laundry, a wood yard and other useful departments. Another commendable feature of these industrial agencies lies in their power to utilize cast-off garments, waste material, and to multiply and extend the donations and gifts of the people for charitable purposes. For instance, the men who repair shoes and the women who wash and patch garments are not only working for the help they need, but they are fitting up articles to be serviceable for others. In this way a vast amount of cast-off material is made to do service in behalf of the needy poor. It is the claim of the Association that they can double every dollar or dollar's worth of material, old or new, donated for the poor and their claim is amply justified by their records and capabilities. It is wise, therefore, for all who wish to help the poor to help them through this Association.

Another prominent feature of these industrial agencies is their educational work. A lack of knowledge in common duties often stands in the way of self-relief. It is the purpose of the Association, therefore, to instruct men, women and children in some of the common affairs of domestic economy as fully as possible. Women are taught to sew, to wash, to iron, to mend, to cook, to run power sewing machines and various other classes of work. In the cooking school girls are taught the first principles of domestic economy and in the nursery and kindergarten smaller children are cared for and taught while their mothers are away at work. This latter service, the care of children for bread-winning mothers, is a matter of almost inexpressible value. Instead of locking small children up in an untidy room at home with all of its accompanying dangers and going out for the day with these awful anxieties upon the mind, mothers can take their children to the nursery of the Provident Association where they will not only be properly fed and cared for, but bathed and taught, as children in the best Christian homes in the city are cared for, and taught, and that at the rate of a nickel a day per child.

In cases of emergency, temporary relief is offered applicants for help at once, but investigations are immediately instituted. If the applicants are found worthy they no longer visit the store house of the Association, but are visited regularly twice a week by the provision wagon of the Association until they are over their immediate troubles. The object of this method is to take away the humiliation of public begging and to discourage professional dependants.

One of the most tender ministries of this Association is its trained nurse department. Dependance on charity for daily bread for a season is deplorable, but it is not to be compared to the condition of that family that has sickness with its destitution. You can hardly imagine the comfort and sunshine that a trained nurse brings into a home of this kind. An angel from heaven could not be more appreciated at such a time than a trained nurse at the bedside of some sick mother or child in some poor tenement home with her soothing words and loving ministry.

The Provident Association has had fortyone years of experience in this work and, having made this a study in the light of this long experience, is prepared to minister the charities of the people with an efficiency not attainable or even dreamed of by individuals who have no other idea of helping the dependent poor than by direct and indiscriminate giving. Their plant on Washington Ave. is one of the most complete equipments for such a ministry west of New York City. There are two other institutions of the kind in St. Louis-the Paul de Vincent and the Hebrew Associations-but there is no other such plant in St. Louis for the efficient distribution of charities and help of the poor.

In their new building on Washington Ave. there are offices for the different executive departments, store rooms, bath rooms, dormitories, laundry, sewing rooms, cooking room, nursery rooms, committee rooms, etc., etc. Everything is systematized and articulated so that the machinery of the Association goes on like clockwork, and until the Christian era dawns, in which poverty shall be eliminated and the saints shall inherit the earth, we trust its educational and helpful agencies in behalf of the poor shall graciously abound.

CHRIST AND MODERN ETHICS.

CHARLES FORSTER.

In our walk to-day we meet with a great class of people who strive after high ideals. These people, though certainly of high culture, make a great mistake when they put aside the ethical system of Christ in the search for what they believe to be higher and more modern ethics. Fascinated by modern philosophy, lost amid the beauties of the search for truth, they give the gospel no place in their ideal system. In many cases, this is done carelessly, not wilfully; and it is hoped that this article will bring before such a class the fact that in Christ and his system is found the highest culture, even culture that they, by human effort, can never attain.

The finest principles of the most popular and humane ethical systems of to-day are found in the gospel. The enthusiasts of these systems assert with eloquence the truths that they have learned. Truths they are, and noble truths, but why put our own minds in the place of revelation, and shut our eyes to its truth. It is good for a man independently to find out truth, but is not good for him to forget the one great truth, that all truth centers itself in God. No matter how far, then, the human mind penetrates the shining halls of truth, these truths can be found between the pages of the written word.

When studying the principles of modern ethics, those of Kant, Mill, Comte, Spencer, for example, if we keep in our minds the principles of the gospel, we will find that all that is solid and true in the former is found in the latter. Utilitarianism, the doctrine that the greatest happiness of the greatest number should be the end and aim of all social and political institutions, is embodied in the Christian religion. Indeed, Christ and the apostles taught the most ideal utilitarianism. They did not set up an institution whose object was the greatest good for the greatest number, but that of one great good for all. Do we not see this great truth in the sentences of the gospel: "Love all men, fear God, honor the king." "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure. whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." In all the writings of these ethical philosophers, can there be found a more precise utilitarianism than is embodied in these sentences? Let us thank God that we have not to wander among the labyrinths of modern philosophy to find the highest truths.

Spencerian philosophy, so much admired to-day, is not unlike the philosophy of those men of Athens who erected the altar to the unknown God. Would to God that the voice of Paul could again ring through the world, and say to every Spencerian disciple: "As I passed by and saw your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription:—To the unknown God." It is a sad fact that these philosophical students of nature should, in their worship of this discovered unknowable, disregard the eternal and revealed truth, that there is one who giveth life and breath to all things, and in him we live and move, and have our being.

To contrast, further, the nature of modern philosophy with that of Christ would take up too much space. Are these examples not enough to show how transcending are the principles of the Christian religion above those of human ethics? It is not good for us to climb high and then ignore that which attained those heights before us. "Why leap ye, ye high hills? This is the hill which God desireth to dwell in; yea, the Lord will dwell in it for ever." Let us be satisfied with this hill, the "unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." No matter how high we climb the hill of science, philosophy and culture, still we have to look upward in order to see the face of our Lord and Savior, Jesus

It will also be seen that, when we put the Christian religion in the background, we ignore the system which has been the only real success the world has ever known—speaking from an ethical standpoint—while all human ideals have failed to accomplish their end. I ask the philosopher, can he lift men as high as this ideal has lifted them? He can not, for this ideal is a conception of God. It is a conception not yet fully conceived by man, and our duty as children of the Creator is to press forward and attain this ideal.

"Thus saith the Lord God: I will also take the highest branch of the highest cedar and will set it; I will crop from the top of his young twigs a tender one, and will plant it upon an high mountain and eminent; in the mountain of the height of Israel will I plant it, and it shall bring forth boughs and bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar; and under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing; in the shadow of the branches thereof shall they The highest cedar, the highest dwell." branch, the topmost, the tenderest, the greenest twig, the one that has been lifted out of the darkness of the forest, and has been kissed by the light of the morning, Christ, the branch, will he "plant in the mountain of the highest Israel." Let us dwell in the branches of this high tree, the highest and the grandest system of ethics that was ever known, or ever will be known, the embodiment of all that is eternal and all that is truth.

DOCTRINE AND DOGMA.

BY A. M. CHAMBERLAIN.

The vague and incomprehensible exercises over human thought a dominion, for the most part unnoticed, but none the less real. It spurs imagination towards heights of discovery and is many times prophet of true induction, while, on the contrary, often, as by weird witchcraft, it turns countless devotees from harvest fields of life to bootless combat on barren slopes of ever unrealized conceits. Like wizard's wand it stretches subtle sceptre over realms of reason till ideas forged from the fire fused fabric of life become first fluescent and then vaporous; till words, crystallized out of the hard essence of experience, effloresce into the amorphous dust of dreams. In no field of mental activity is this more apparent than in that where religion compels consideration of the questions of duty and destiny.

When Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles, came to the Athenians, he found their whole attention fixed upon hearing and telling something new. A race of wonderful genius, those old Greeks! They knew well the roads to Corinth and to Sparta, and into Elis, to Marathon and Delphi and to Thebes. Their daring had sufficed in Xenophon to track the unknown wilderness from Cunaxa to Trebizond. They had colonized and then fought Syracuse. Their sails had passed the Pillars of Hercules. But this was not enough. There must be always something new. These, the hard ways of fact, must lead to greater wonders, even lands of the Lotus eaters and the island continent of Atlantis. In such fashion does Mystery, mother of wonders, add to her mythic brood. It were bootless to attempt to trace the origin of the fabled tales of antiquity, but it may be not without interest to note the analogous process by which dogma, first superadded, at last almost displaced the doctrine of the Incarnate Life. We may hark back to Nicæa, after the vagrant fancies of near a score of centuries, to watch the first florescence in ecclesiastical life of that prolific plant whose fruit has made for spiritual decadence. Turbulence which gathered there in the early days was no longer able to content itself with the statements of the Apostolic age as to the relation existing between Jesus and the Father, and the whole contest of that most tumultuous assembly turned on the "vital question" of whether Jesus should or should not be declared homoousion, of the same substance with the Father. The question was acute, the contest keen, and victory was with those who affirmed. But just what difference, after all, the acceptance or non-acceptance of this statement has ever made or was ever expected to make in the actual lives of men, has probably never very clearly presented itself to any mind in any age. This, however, was but the first of many contests similar in character, until the real life of the church for centuries was wrapped up in such exploiting of dogma; and dogma had usurped the place of doctrine in both organic and individual Christian activity. As a modern writer says: "The history of doctrines was, until recently, considered only as a chapter in Dogmatics.'

It is the purpose of this article to lay emphasis upon the fact that, in New Testament usage, there is wide divergence between doctrine and dogma, and that the divergence between "doctrines" of Apostolic utterance, and "dogmas," so fully occupying religious thought in the last fifteen centuries, is even greater.

The words "didache" and "didaskalia" occur fifty-one times in the New Testament writings, and, with practical unanimity, they are rendered "doctrine." The word "dogma" occurs in the New Testament but five times and is three times rendered "decree" and twice "ordinance." Between it and the more modern usage of the term this difference exists: both are the mandate of authority, but the ancient "dogma" was something to be done, the modern dogma is a statement, whether intelligible or unintelligible it matters not, to be unhesitatingly affirmed. Discriminated from both, but less remote from the ancient idea than from the modern, the "doctrines" of the Apostolic day were things to be done, incorporated in life, not essentially because commanded by authority, but because revealed and commended to the conscience as right. The gospel won its way by the gentle powers of the Spirit, not by the forceful mandate of

The fundamental stimulus of all Apostolic injunction was the yearning for "newness of life." New ideals and new practice were welded together in the fabric of that marvelous "early Church." At the very outset of the era of gospel proclamation, we are told that "the disciples continued steadfastly in the Apostles' doctrine." A comment of worth in determining the exact content of this phrase results from attempt to make parallel utterance with regard to the early days of the "Great Reformation."

use of the term "sound dostrine." We our-

Suppose we say of the reformers that "they continued steadfastly in the Heidelburg Confession." We shall be accused of descending to burlesque. But the burlesque is in the changed condition of the church. It has not been originated by this discussion. Where, then, is the difference? Manifestly in that the "doctrines" of the former age are messages for application in living, while the "dogmas" of the Confession, without practical bearing, are bulwarks of futile words builded about thought in its most abstract phases. As casting definite light on the Apostolic meaning of the term "doctrine," let it be noted that in First Timothy 1:9, 10, murder, fornication, lying and perjury are noted as things against "sound doctrine." In Second Timothy 3:16, 17, in like manner, we are told that the inspired records are profitable for "doctrine," among other things "that the man of God may be furnished unto every good work." Again, in Titus 1:1-3, temperance, gravity, faith, love, patience, etc., qualities of life and not of affirmation, are noted as things befitting "sound doctrine." Is there left any uncertainty as to the character of "doctrine" in the Apostolic days? I trow not. But if we stop to sift these thoughts and to compare the resultant ideas with our own modern conceptions of "sound doctrine," shall we find that we, plea for primitive Christianity notwithstanding, have entirely escaped inoculation with the creedal bacillus? When we speak of "sound doctrine," have we in mind the moral basis of right living or some philosophy of the process of reg neration? Is it a mistake to say that the latter has far the larger part in our conception? This is our heritage from more than a thousand years spent in creed-mongering. It would be quite profitless to spend time in curious search of antiquity for the rise and progress of old feuds founded on purely abstract speculation. We all know enough of them to be amazed that they could have been the source of such unbrotherliness of persecution as, in many ages of the church, disgraces its history. This process of salvation by logic held almost undisputed sway for a whole millennium. We are scarce out of its shadow, here on the threshold of the twentieth Christian century. The atmosphere of this vanishing past is strongly sketched by John Morley in his recent "Life of Cromwell." Of the age of the mighty Oliver he says: "Just as mediæval schoolmen discussed the nature and existence of universals in one century and the mysteries of immortality and a superhuman First Cause in another century, so, now, divines and laymen discuss predestination, justification, election, reprobation and the whole unfathomable body of theological metaphysics by the same method-verbal logic drawing sterile conclusions from unexplored authori y."

The day draws on when this fruitless folly of philosophy is no longer in repute. The creeds are passing. Yet is there danger that, in forsaking old forms of thought, the world shall discard rather than reform its selves, strenuous as has been our protest against "the creed," have not, in this particular, been wholly guiltless. We have said that we would use Bible terms for Bible things, but when we have declared a man "sound in the faith," have we not thought rather of certain sermons on "first principles" than of the force of precept and example with reference to lying and licentiousness and ten perance and love and patience? It is time that the word "doctrine" be restored to its Apostolic meaning in our thought; that "doctrine" should resume its place in the church as the main element in Christian teaching. "Sound doctrine" is what the world needs to day, what the church needs. Honesty should be the mark of all Christians; liberality, not covetousness, the stamp upon their lives. This is "sound doctrine." We shall have a better church membership when the emphasis is better distributed between faith, repentance, baptism, and lying, perjury, licentiousness, profanity, temperance, patience, love. Not that I would alter church practice in "first principles," or cease to uphold our duty to follow the leading of the Divine Spirit in regard to the formalities of the church's organic life, but emphasis is needed on the fact that one may acquiesce in all the appointed ordinances of the Church of God, and yet be but the more condemned if the "sound doctrine" toward which they look does not thereafter mold the life and character. Fidelity of heart as well as brain is demanded to make a real Christian life. This is the vital matter. Who doubts that God will pardon errors of judgment when he cannot pardon errors of affection? Fidelity of practice as to the subjec's and substance of baptism is without question for the advantage and health of the church as an organization, but fidelity of life with regard to questions of character will have final weight in decision of destiny. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Doctrine and dogma meet and blend in the person of Jesus. He sets the standard and the limit for both. He says of himself, "I and my Father are one." This is dogma. It smacks of unfathomed mystery. Yet does it open no door to profitable speculation. Linked with the gracious ministry of Jesus, it assures the world of the wealth of the Father's love. So far is it revelation, but beyond that it but adds to the mysteries of life. Where Jesus lived above the human plane, in his miracles and his attitude toward sin and sinner, we gather from his declaration that we see the Father in seeing him; but no amount of speculation has been able, either with the "homoousion" of Nicæa or with any other epithet, to clarify our conception of the relation existing between the Father and the Son. Is it not a little strange, indeed, that those who have never penetrated the mystery of the connection of soul and body in their own natures, should yet think themselves competent to discuss the infinitely more subtle relations subsisting under the manifestations of the Deity? Enough that we see in Christ Immanuel, God with us, seeking us, to save us. Ah, "what is man that thou art mindful of him!" Hallowed and haloed by the mission of the Master, let us pray Paul's prayer for his children in the faith. "We bow our knees unto the Father, from whom every fatherhood in heaven and cnearth is named. that he will grant us, according to the riches of his glory, that we may be strengthened with power through his Spirit in the inward man; that Christ may dwell in our hearts through faith; to the end that we, being rooted and grounded in love, may be strong to apprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that we may be filled unto all the fullness of God. And unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church and in Christ Jesus unto all generations, forever and ever.

But Jesus is also "doctrine." When on the human plans, he says: "I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life," he is no longer obscure, no longer mysterious, but practical and comprehensible. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." No man's life becomes accordant with the divine ideal of human life, save as it patterns after my life in its human manifestations. I am the way to live, I am the truth about duty, I am the life that endures. Doctrine is comprehensible. It relates to the realm of human experience. It touches the springs of human action. Dogma, on the other hand, is the voice of authority. The need of authority betokens the realm of mystery. If the authority is valid, then dogma crowns mystery with hope, bulwarks it with faith, seals it for the revelations of the days to come. Humanity needs little thereof, and little is vouchsafed. Meagre dogma, but that proved divine, God and Christ and the Holy Spirit and the spirits of just men made perfect, bound by a mighty love into a common family, this fills the measure. But, in our frai. natures, what demand for "doctrine?" And "doctrine," divinely revealed and illustrated but humanly comprehensible, God has accorded us. "Never man spake like this man." Never man lived and loved like this.

Let us fill thought and preaching with this truth, that "doctrine" is precept, illuminated by example, laying hold on life. It has no part with speculation or philosophy in any degree. It knows nothing of "schemes of redemption" or "the orderly plan of salvation," as though there were machine and process for delivering souls thoroughly cured and preserved at the rate of so many per hour; but it deals with human weakness, with human temptation, with human inspiration, with human life. Here is the solicitude of Paul for Timothy. This is "doctrine." Precept and example and love blended to reflect the life of man glorified in Christ Jesus, to reflect it into darkened hearts and lives until they too shall wake unto real life be fore the presence of him who is the light of men. Aye, "Preach the Word; be instant, in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering and doctrine." Doctrine deals with the questions of pratical life, with to-day's duties, with the saloon and corrupt politics, with the oppression of the poor and the sanctity of the law, with our use of money and our obligation to the oppressed, with the lusts of the flesh and the pride of life. When we who wear Jesus' name look oftener to see what we would do in these things, and strive more to follow him in practical affairs we shall understand better what the apostle meant when he further wrote to Timothy: "Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear unto all. Take heed unto thyself and unto the DOCTRINE; continue in them; for in doing this, thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee."

The following poem, written by Rose Bush Wilkinson, of Hastings, Nebraska, was one of the hits at our National Convention at Kansas ity. It was read on Tuesday morning at the National Convention in Armory Hall, by Miss Mand Worthing, of Hastings, Nebraska. No speech of the convention created more enthusiasm. It was excellently rendered by Miss Worthing, who re ceived repeated applause.

This poen celebrates the run which E. F. Boggess made into the Cherokee Strip on September 16, 1893, under the auspices of the Board of Church Extension, for the purpose of securing church lots for erecti n of Christian church buildings. Brother Muckley, the secretary of the Board, has been urging some of our prople with poetic instinct to immort lize this ride in verse. Other poems will doubtless appear]

BOGGESS' RIDE.

BY ROSE BUSH WILKINSON, HASTINGS, NEB.

You have read from a grea English poet, How a man once gained renown, By a famous ride on his wedding day From London to Edmontown. John Gilpin rode for his dinner that day, For his dinner, John Gilpin rode.

From a loved American poet, Known wherever our language is known, You have read of a famous midnight ride

In peril, in darkness, alone.
Paul Revere rod- for sweet liberty's sake, For liberty, Paul Revere rode.

You have read from history's pages, How another liberty's son Intrepidly rode down a flight of stone stairs And escaped from the enemies' guns.

Brave Putnam rode for his life that day, For dear life, Israel Putnam rode.

You have read with pride and with pleasure, From poet and historian, too, How the Union was served and a battle saved By the ride of a patriot true.

Phil Sheridan rode for vict'ry that day, For our flag, Philip Sheridan rode.

Could one ride for anything nobler Than the flag we love so well?

Aye, one hath ridden for nobler Cause. Of that Cause and that ride I would tell. For Church Extension, E. F. Boggess rode, Boggess rode for the Church's Extension.

On the third of September, in '93, The fertile land of the Cherokee Was given o'er by our law's decree To settlers of every station. They might make homes on its sunny plain,

Might stake out cities and hold domain

O'er all its acres. Might go and gain Each for himself a location

And in order that justice might here hold sway. And each have equal right of way, 'Twas arran ed that on the sixteenth day

Of this same month of September At the hour of noon a signal should sound. And every home-seeker in line on the ground Might enter the race. Oh, surely 'twas bound To be a race that all would remember.

All manner of people ranged side by side The pedestrian to run, the equestrian to ride Each to choose his own transit, but whatever betide,

Each to strive in the race to be winner. The rich and the poor, the timid, the bold; The lover of home and the lover of gold; The tradesman, the toi er; the maid, young and old; The wise and unwise: saint and sinner.

Now, our Church Extension Board was awake And had said: "Why shall we not for the sake Of our King and Eis Kingdom's extension take

In this land some goodly possession?
Let us here make homes for the oft homeless bride, The Church of Christ. When for her sake he died, Can we not find one who will dare to ride For her sake in that great procession?

So to Boggess they turned in this hour of need And said: "You are the man. Go find a fit steed And training for nimbleness, promptness and speed, Prepare for that race to be ready."

And B ggess procured a good horse and a tent Where the horse might be cared for, then carefully bent

His thought to that training (one purpose intent), With true heart and hand firm and steady.

(Oklahoma could tell you with pride of the man Who prepared for the race and was found in the van,

And Kentucky, with pride, of the good horse that ran

Well enough to be oft told in story. But pride in an effort like this hath small place, The worldling may glory in the man and the race. But we here to-day may alone praise His grace In whose presence no flesh shall glory.)

The day has arrived! The hour is at hand! See the long line expectant now breathlessly stand, Each eager, intent, with his watch in his hand Till the signal to go shall be given.

The silence so great you can hear the tick, tick Of watches, and almost the hearts beating quick, Till suddenly—Hark! 'Tis the signal gun's click And the very air seems to be riven.

Here's the train-over-laden-kept at eight-hour speed;

There are vehicles varied; wheels vieing with ateed.

And youdar is Boggess away in the lead, On the horse that seems proud of his training. See! He leaps a broad stream. 'Tis a full rod across.-Then onward he goes, without swerving or pause. Oh! well rides our friend for the good of the Cause-The Cause so well worth our maintaining.

-on, see him speed o'er the wide, rolling prairie. On-On-on, till he reaches the town-site of Perry. Here, a forman confronts, but our rider is wary And ready for one, or a dozen.

He dismounts, stakes in hand, the church-site to decide,

When, halt! by a cut throat his claim is defied, But he springs 'cross the street with quick, vaulting stride

And the church-site is soon safely chosen

But the rider has still other conquests to gain, So, day after day he rides on o'er the plain. And chooses locations again and again

Where the church may find safe habitation, And in white raiment* wait another Rider* to come On a white horse* from heaven to take his bride home.

That Rider the Faithful*—that Rider the Groom, The Christ at whose name every nation.

With quick-bending knee and with low-bowing head Shall confess that He liveth who once had been dead.

And shall honor the Church with such glorious H ad,

-The Bride who that name hath been wearing. Oh! then when earth's glory and fame shall have flown,

-then shall the glory of heaven be known, And Boggess be honored—yet not he, alone, But all they that love Christ's appearing.

POPULAR AMUSEMENTS.

E. W. THORNTON.

The solution of the problem involved in the abuse of amusement has been variously attempted. Some maintain that the church should positively forbid indulgence in certain forms of amusement, and that the disobedient should be expelled from fellowship. But this course is admittedly not without objection unless the disobedience be a clearly apparent evidence of godlessness of character, and then it is the godlessness and not the act of disobedience that really demands the discipline. Others maintain that our best Christian men and women should patronize those amusements most fascinating to young people, thus raising the standard of excellence and compelling amusements of a better class. Spurgeon styled this plan of procedure to be about as consistent as an effort to purify a sewer by pouring lavender water into it. Still others maintain that the church should furnish amusements of a high order for the express purpose of counteracting the effect of those of a low order furnished by the world. But the church can scarcely afford to go into the show business for even so laudable a purpose as this. Is there, then, any solution? I believe there is. It is to be found where the solution of every other such problem is to be found-in the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. But the gospel, instead of being a list of laws with which to regulate conduct, is an elucidation of principles upon which to build character. While the commands, "thou shalt not dance," "thou shalt not attend theaters," and "thou shalt not play cards," are not in the Scriptures, there is that there which presupposes more intelligence and finer consecration than the necessity for such petty commands would indicate. By the Christian, therefore, the rightness or wrongness of any course of conduct is to be determined according to the Christian principles involved, and the Christian principles involved in the question of amusement are no more difficult to determine than others when there is a sincere desire to know them. Adopting this method of solving our problem it seems to me to be easily apparent:

First, that those amusements should be shunned which are doubtful in their moral tone. 1 Thess. 5:22: "Abstain from every appearance of evil."

Second, that those amusements should be shunned which tend to destroy reverence for God and detract from the power of his truth. 1. Cor. 10:31: "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

Third, that those amusements should be shunned which may not safely be indulged in by the weak as well as the strong. 1 Cor. 8:9: "Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak."

Fourth, that those amusements should be shunned whose tendency is to conform the Christian to the world, instead of transforming the world into the likeness of Christ. Rom. 12:2: "Be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of Fifth, that those amusements should be shunned upon which the blessings of God may not consistently be invoked. Prov. 15:8: "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord: but the prayer of the righteous is his delight."

"But." you exclaim, 'can any amusement pass muster when subjected to such a test?" Yes. Every amusement is right which fulfils the purpose for which amusements were divinely intended.

Amusements were intended to be recreative and not dissipative. They were intended to be constructive and not destructive of physical, mental, moral and spiritual vigor. They were intended to be tonic and not toxic. They were intended to be a means to an end, and not an end in themsel es. They were intended to be clean, pure, sweet, wholesome, temperate and helpful; not contributing to a flippant, superficial view of life, but resulting in the best possible preparation for life's God-given tasks.

SHUT-IN.

[The following extract from a personal letter is from a sister well known in Missouri and New York City for her piety and zeal Although reared in wealth, her father being at that time a Wall Street broker, she never neglected the study of the Bible, nor shirked a duty in Sunday-school. Now, in her affliction, shastill shows what may be done in keeping up her daily study of God's word. How she puts many of us, who enjoy far better health, to shame in this respect!

CLAYTON KEITH]

I am going to write, but I have been almost a complete "shut-in" for more than two years. And that reminds me that I saw somewhere in my reading recently that the man had been around again questioning the little S. S. class. This time he asked if any of them could tell him whim the Lord shut in? The bright little boy was present and shrie eed out, "Jonah!"

Sometimes people ask me if I don't get very lonesome, as I can't go out and there is so little that I can do, but my answer always is, no, no in teed. I even wish the days were longer, but I am always glad to see my friends,—not in the sense of loneliness though, like a little boy who lived downstairs, who once, when his aunty was out, came up to ask if he might stay with me, as he was so lonesome, and not even a peddler would come.

We live a very plain, quiet life, with little or no worry about the formidable Mrs. Grundy and her notions of how things should be. My husband is much of a student. He loves the study of language and has what he calls a smattering of half a dozen or more languages. One of his chief delights is the study of words of our own language. 'Tis astonishing how much he will get out of a word before he runs it down. One of our morning papers gave 20 lessons in French for the benefit of those expecting to go to the Exposition this summer. We had no expectation of going anywhere, but we went faithfully through all the lessons, and began again to speak French to each other.

I am beginning to notice a difference in e seasons. At first I couldn't tell whether it was summer or winter without special reference to the months. We wear the same clothing right along all the time, overcoats and all. The climate of San Francisco is peculiar. I have often been walking with my teeth chattering almost, and shivering all over, and on looking around would see a palm tree, or a magnolia, or probably a great cactus that could not be covered with a hogshead. It is what I call an inconsistent climate. Fuchsias and heliotrope grow most luxuriantly out of doors. I have seen fuchsias climbing all over the side of a twostory house, with large and very abundant flowers. Our "spell of weather" for the past week shows no sign of letting up. It makes me think of weather in Brooklyn and of a February spent in London several years ago, when the sun was scarcely seen the whole month, and consequently a great number of the "old asthmatics" in that city died off.

Now I want to speak of our studies. My husband and I are daily reading the Bible through together,-have gone through it several times since our marriage, but a short time ago I determined to take up the New Testament myself, and as I have some knowledge of the Greek, my special delight is in my Greek Testament, with a word-for-word translation into English right under the Greek, and I believe that is the best way to study a language. I remember that our last and best French teacher started us girls with the gospel of John, and we were soon able to converse in French. I am trying to read all of the New Testament in the words of Christ and his apostles! It is a little difficult, but so interesting and so helpful! I enjoy it very much. I wake about six o'clock in the morning and, propped up on my pile of pillows, and rolled in blankets and shawls, I am ready for my morning study. S metimes I go over what I have read before (it is always best to review), and sometimes I go on several chapters. I am now in 2 Cor., 8th chapter.

Now for the best part. I always love the Psalms of David. The 37th was my father's favorite, the 34th was my old Sunday-school teacher's in New York, but I can't settle down on any one, where so many are full of praise and beauty. I was surprised during some of my sickness, when I couldn't read, how that old 23rd Psalm came to me, with new beauty and freshness, every word seemed weighted down with joy, comfort and peace. You ask what gave me most comfort. It was the blessed assurance that I am Christ's and he is mine, and all those glorious promises which shall never fail. I know whom I have believed, and I can trust him. Oh! how I love him. Don't you remember that first and great commandment, and the second which is like unto it? I haven't gotten the full of either of them yet,-but, as the children say, "I'm going on." Yes, and going on in hope. Love is the fulfilling of the law, and "the greatest thing in the world." I sometimes wish I had more literature to aid me in the study of the Bible. If I could afford it, I would have the

AN HISTORIC BIBLE.

DECIMA CAMPBELL BARCLAY.

The short paragraph which appeared in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST last week, from the Bunker Hill Gazette, said: "The Rev. J. G. M. Luttenberger, of Dorchester, while traveling in Europe recently, came across an old Bible at Strasburg, Germany. This book is probably the oldest Bible in America. It is the original translation of Martin Luther and was published in 1729, 171 years ago." I have now in my possession a much older Bible, which was published in London in 1696, during the reign of "William and Mary," and is 204 years old. It is in almost perfect condition, a large, firmly bound volume in heavy calf binding and contains, besides the Old and New Testaments, "The Book of Common Prayer," "The Thirty-nine Articles of Religion," "The Psalms in metre, "The Gun-powder plot" and "The Apocrypha." This "Family Bible" descended to my husband from his great-grandmother, Mary Hoops, of Philadelphia, who was married to Thomas Barclay in 1770, so that it must have been in the possession of the Hoops family many years prior to her birth. We have also another most valuable Polyglot Bible, published by Samuel Bagster, London, in 1831, and given to my dear father, Alexander Campbell, in 1847 by the churches of Scotland. The following presentation is beautifully written and illuminated by hand, and is a most wonderful specimen of exquisite penmanship:

October, 1847.

On every page the Bible is printed in eight languages, Hebrew, English, Greek Latin, German, Italian, French and Spanish, and it is elegantly and substantially bound in Morocco leather, and is by far the largest and handsomest Bible I have ever seen. Its cost was sixty English pounds, or nearly three hundred dollars.

In 1863, my father wrote in clear, distinct characters, with his own hand, the following presentation:

To John Judson Barclay, and Decima Campbell Barclay, his wife, with the most affectionate regards of their father, is this most precious Holy Bible presented. A. CAMPBELL

ARE THE MISSIONARIES TO BLAME?

[The following article, which appeared originally in the Shanghai Mercury, is sent to us by the kindness of Mrs. C. E. Garst. It shows the attitude of an intelligent layman, a foreign resident of China, toward the oft-repeated allegation that the missionaries are the real cause of all the trouble botween the Chinese and the foreigners .-

The blind objections to missionaries being made by some writers just now, exhibit a want of thought and discrimination. Not a missionary myself, I, from a purely commercial stand-point, appreciate their devoted labors, their moral example and influence. The great majority of Protestant missionaries wisely have refrained from assuming or desiring any official status, and in doing so have avoided making themselves stumbling-blocks to the non-Christian natives, as so many of the Roman Catholics and a small minority of the Protestants have done. But the foreign resident who now rushes into print and demands that missionary labors cease in China, is wanting in the exercise of common sense.

The missionary, with good reason, might retort that all commercial men and civilian foreigners should be deported, because the lives of a number of them in the treaty ports are an outrage on all the best ideas of the natives, and a libel on Western civilization.

In the Boxer placards it has been said that "foreign men disregard all the human obligations and their women commit adul-Now in no instance can this be tery." asserted of the missionaries in China, but unfortunately it does hold true of a certain minority among the foreign residents.

Instead of clamoring for the expulsion of all foreign residents because of the sins of the few, the missionaries are level-headed enough to see that what is needed is not expulsion, but decided protest by all those foreigners who desire the higher standard of their respective nations to be emphasized in this land. The protest should be made privately and publicly, both in and out of the press, so that the natives around us can plainly see that foreign public opinion does not for a moment condone what its highest ideals distinctly condemn. The man or woman of foreign birth who lives an immoral life; the foreigner who illtreats a coolie, as he would not dare for an instant to treat a London cab-man; the Westerner, be he an ordinary private individual or a city father, who encourages, establishes or patronizes lotteries; in fact, any among the foreign com nunities of China who in any way lower the standard of life they have in the home-lands been taught to respect and aim at, do more to prepare the way for corrupt officials, bent on stirring up the ignorant people of China, than all the mistakes of all the missionaries put together. The writer is well aware that among certain sick-brained circles it is fashionable to deride the methods, objects and personal character of the missionaries, and while not claiming for them absolute perfection, nor asserting that they are free altogether from minor errors, it is certain that, taking them in a body, the percentage of those among them that are actuated by selfish motives is minute.

The number among them who fail to give an example of pure morality in their stations in the interior and elsewhere, is less than the proportion of similar failures among the established clergy of the homelands. The criticism of their objects comes ill from men whose whole heritage of worth is the main result of similar propaganda in their own native lands in the past. At the foundation of much ill-natured, ignorant criticism of missionaries, and the real cause of the lying reports that are spread abroad, is an uncomfortable feeling, resulting from the critics often living in a manner that would, if known, shut them out from their own parental roof. Where missionaries live in the interior, away from all foreign civilians or officials, there are no houses of illfame, kept for, or by, foreigners. In such places there are no lotteries licensed and supported by foreigners. There no natives are cuffed and kicked, for there are no rowdy young foreign "drunks" to drag their nation's character in the mire. Ninety per cent. of the foreigners who glibly calumniate the missionaries have absolutely no real knowledge of the subject on which they air gaseous opinions. Few of them have ever visited a mission station or seen a native convert. If they have, the writer can testify that often the native convert's character and life would cause many a foreigner to hang his head in shame, for better opportunities unavailed of.

When "loaves and fishes" is quoted as the raison d'etre of missionaries being in China, it never occurs to the uncultured, illeducated carpers that they should first make sure of the past history of those whom they so readily vilify, or they might discover that never was assertion more unfounded, and that many now in the mission field have given up more than their small-brained mudflingers are ever likely to attain. "When the wine is in the fool comes out," and on hotel and club bar critics we will waste no more time.

When it is remembered that the knowledge of the language is largely due to the labors of a succession of missionaries, it will be seen how much even the consular services owe to missionary workers in the past, as also to several who are still among us. But when coasideration is carefully given to the fact that, all over the interior in places where the foreigner is otherwise unknown, he is first introduced in the person of a missionary, who lives quietly a moral life, so that all his immediate neighbors or close acquaintances acquire a favorable knowledge of an individual foreigner, and from that particular argue favorably in general of foreigners.

All over the Empire, again and again, in times of trouble and riot the immediate acquaintances of the missionaries, as well as the converts, have stood by their foreign teachers at the peril of their own lives, proving conclusively the good opinions won by the example of their lives and teaching. All through the horrid riots of 1891 2 the native converts remained faithful not only to their missionary pastors (laying down in some instances their own lives to save the foreigners), but also were staunch in their faith, in spite of all tortures and persecutions, too horrible to relate in detail. Such centres of enlightenment as to what foreigners are, and have to give the Chinese, open up the country for trade, and again and again can the demand for foreign goods be traced directly to the influence of missionaries in the interior.

If trade follows the flag, it is because the flag is usually made known by a good introduction on the part of the missionaries.

Withdraw your missionaries, and send into the interior your young rowdy riotous liver. with his "sleeping dictionary" concubines, his drunkenness and bullying conduct, and see how much worse your trade and reputation will soon be.

It is high time that we drop all mad talk about missionaries, and instead of trying to make scape goats of any one section of foreign residents, while endeavoring to reform all these evils that prejudice us in the eyes of the natives, show that we know that behind all auti foreign agitation is the Peking government, as chief instigator and offender. The day will never come when missionaries are withdrawn from China, but if it did, the writer as a commercial man would venture to prophesy with certainty the early ruin of foreign trade with China.

Our Budget.

-Now that the election is over, let us get down to real business.

-Not but that the choosing of the president and of governors and congressmen is important, but its importance depends upon the educational, moral and religious work that lies behind it.

—By real business, therefore, we mean the education and the moral and religious training of the people so that they shall be prepared to discharge intelligently the duties which devolve upon us as rational, moral and religious beings.

—We are writing this, of course, before the re sult of the election is known, but no matter what the results may be the program of Christian work will be carried out just the same. The campaign just closing has been unusually quiet and orderly, with very few exceptions, and highly creditable to the American people, but it has, nevertheless, detracted more or less from interest in religious work, which ought now be resumed with all earnestness and concentration of purpose.

—We publish this week the program of the Virginia State Convention to be held in Richmond November 13-16. The brethren in Georgia hold their missionary convention at Augusta, November 20-23. The editor of this paper has accepted a place on the program of both these conventions, and anticipates a delightful season of fellowship with the brethren of these two states. We bespeak for them a large and representative attendance from the brotherhood of these states.

-By a strange oversight in mentioning the colleges represented at the Kansas City Convention, we omitted the name of Cotner, which was represented by three of the professors and many of the students. Prof. W. P. Aylesworth delivered one of the addresses on education. We regret this lapsus pennæ all the more because Cotner has recently shown remarkable grit, vitality and power in canceling its indebtedness, and in girding itself as a strong man to run a race. The truth is, we have so many colleges that it is a perilous thing for one to undertake to mention all of them without having a list before his eyes. We are glad to learn that Cotner has opened the present session with brighter prospects than for several years, and that the brethren there are laying deep and broad foundations for our educational work, not only in Nebraska but in that great northwest of which it is a part.

—Sumner T. Martin sends us the program of a "Convention Echoes" meeting held; by the First Christian Church in Omaha, which is the real thing in the way of a meeting of this sort. There were fifteen members of this church at the Kansas City Convention and every one of them accepted a place on the program of this service. Surely the church must have gotten not only a great deal of wholesome information about the convention, but much of its enthusiam and spiritual uplift.

As we close up this paper, long lines of men are standing in rows over the city quietly exercising the right of suffrage by depositing ballots, expressing their choice for men to fill the various elective offices which are to be filled the present election. This is a spectacle to be witnessed in no other country in the world on such a scale as in the United States. The great work of the future, politically, is to make these ballots all honest and intelligent, as the great majority of them already are. Much remains to be done, however, in the way of cleansing the Augean stables of our political life so that there shall be a free ballot, an intelligent vote and an honest count in every precinct throughout our country's wide domain.

—The cut on our first page this week represents the new building of the West Side Church of Chicago, which was but recently completed, and which was dedicated on last Lord's day. The basement of this church was built several years ago, but on account of various hindrances the building has not been completed until recently. We have no report at this writing, of the dedication services, but we congratulate the church on its success and on the presence with it of its old pastor, J. W. Allen, who has done so much to make the church what it is. We trust its future may be marked by increasing power and usefulness.

—The West Virginia Christian, published at Cameron, West Virginia, and edited by J. A. Canby and J. W. Yoho, reports the State Missionary Convention in that state, recently held, as most successful and encouraging. The report of State Evangelist A. Lineletter presented the best reports in the way of results in the history of the organized state work. The addresses were said to be of a high order. The editorial report of the convention closes with this statement: "We do not rememer any state convention that had so many elements of success."

—We have received a reprint of the thoughtful article on "The Decline of the Churches—Some Causes and Remedies," which appeared in the Reformed Quarterly Review for October, by E. P. Wise, formerly of Irvington, Ind., and now of Somerset, Pa. The causes of decline which are mentioned are: (1) the fact that the church is judged by its unworthy representatives rather than by its perfect founder; (2) lack of dependence on the Holy Spirit; (3) a weakening of the authority of the Bible; (4) lack of the Christo-centric plea, wherein the church barely keeps pace with the world in its increased emphasis on the personality of Christ; (5) failure of adjustment to new channels, (6) lack of social sympathy.

-We had an unusually large and interesting session of our Ministerial Association in the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last Monday. W. E. Harlow, who has just clased a very successful meeting at the Fourth Church, delivered an interesting address before the ministers on "Psychic Phenomena;" in which he claimed that there was one underlying principle for all the phenomena of Spiritualism, Christian Science, Dowieism, magnetic healing, faith cures, etc., namely that of therapeutic suggestion. Brother Harlow has made a special study of this subject, and his address was listened to with deep interest. The discussion led by J. Caldwell was also a lively feature of the meeting. Next Monday Mr. Caldwell will read a paper on "Social Settlements and the Institutional Church," and business men interested in downtown work are invited to be present to hear the same.

-Calvinism, as set forth in the Westminster Confession, has shown itself to be so susceptible of different interpretations that there is room for differences of opinion as to what the confession teaches about election and reprobation, just as there are differences of opinion as to what the New Testament teaches about it. So there is place for the book recently written by Prof. J. V. Stephens of the Theological Seminary at Lebanon, Tenn., to discuss the question as to whether or not the Westminster Confession teaches that some infants (i. e. the non-elect) dying in infancy are doomed to eternal woe. The author shows that the confession, as understood by those who wrote it, does teach that herrible doctrine. No wonder that a civilization which organizes societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children calls for a revision of such a creed.

The Small of the Back

That is where some people feel weak all the time.

They are likely to be despondent and it is not unusual to find them borrowing trouble as if they hadn't enough already.

The fact is their kidneys are weak, either naturally or because of sickness, exposure, worry or other influences.

"I am thankful to say," writes J. L. Campbell, of Sycamore, Ill., "that Hood's Sarsaparilla has cured me. For many years I was troubled with backache. At times I was so bad I had to be helped from the bed or chair. I am now well and strong and free from pain." What this great medicine did for him it has done for others.

-A correspondent from Kentucky, Rev. E. M. Doddridge, calls our attention to an inaccuracy in the Current Events of last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST where we stated that the officers of election in that state under the Goebel law will all be Democrats. It is true, as our correspondent says, that the law does provide that election officers shall not all be o one political party. But it is also true that the appointment of the officers of election is entirely in the hands of the County Boards of Election which are unanimously Democratic by appointment. The law also provides that the election officers of each proci er shall be merely of different parties. The appointment of two Democrats and two Populists will meet this requirement. It is known upon good authority that as a matter of fact this is exactly what has been done in many cases and the Republicans have without success repeatedly petitioned in many places for at least one representative at the polls. The CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST is a non-partisan paper but it has never made any particular secret of its opinion that the Goebel law is a piece of conspicuously unjust legislation. Even the Ken tucky Legislature has registered its opinion that the Goebel law is good enough to repeal.

-The article by Charles Forster on "Christ and Modern Ethics" will repay a careful reading. It is worth while to note, in any consideration of Christ and the philosophical writers upon ethics, that modern ethical theory covers, for the most part, different ground from that of the ethical teaching of Christ. The enunciation of a philosophy of ethics was as far from the purpose of Jesus as was the statement of the facts of natural science, as such, from the purpose of the writer of Genesis. Jesus taught conduct, not the philosophy of conduct. No reputable philosopher has ever dissented from the moral teaching of Jesus; that has furnished the content of right conduct in all of their systems. The philosopher is the man who tries to understand, and the ethical theorist is he who tries to reduce to a system all that he can know of the what and why of moral obligation. Modern thinkers have helped us much in our understanding of God's moral order, but he would be more fool than philosopher who, seeking for the clearest view of man as a moral agent, should reverse the moral judgments of him whose insight into human motives was as keen and unerring as his own conduct was irreproachable.

-The office of the Christian Evangelist was favored recently by a visit from Dr E. C. L Miller, who has just now returned from five years of medical missionary work in Central Province, India. Dr. Miller has been in the midst of the famine stricken district and during the past year has been in charge of one of the government kitchens at which 2,000 natives were fed daily. The famine, he says, was caused less by an actual scarcity of grain than by a financial scare which sent the price of all food up out of reach of the poor people. The same financial panic stopped industry and left thousands, almost millions, with no employment and no income. During the first part of the famine, grain was being exported from India, but the people starved because they could not boy it. The crop failure later only intensified this distress. The British government, says Dr. Miller, has done all a government could do to

-It is desired that special attention be called to a movement inaugurated by the ex cutive committee of the Christian Church Widows and Orphans' Home at Louisville, Ky., to raise a Twentieth Century Endowment for that institution. No missionary or benevolent appeal more richly deserves our attention than the cry which comes from the helpless children of those that have worn themselves out in the service of the Lord and have entered into their eternal rest. We heartily commend this attempt to raise a $50,000 en own nt for the Orphans' Home. If you can give $5,000, you will be allowed to keep five orphan children in the Home continually and the fund will be called "The Memorial Fund" named after the giver. A special appeal is made for One Dollar off rings. Of course, if you can give more, it will be greatly appreciated. If every reader of this paper would give, and if the readers of all our papers would do the same thing, $100,000 would be raised in less than ten days. At least send $1 to Robt. H. -The following note from the president of Central Christian College will convey welcome news to all those who are interested in that worthy school. The new accession can but add much strength to the facu ty.

The Board of Central Christian College, Albany, Mo, has called to its faculty R. A. Gilcrest, A M., late Prof. of Sacred Literature in Eureka College, Ill Bro. Gilcrest is a scholar of rare qualifications and a successful teacher. He will, in the field, act as our sccredited financial agent and solicitor. It is very desirable that the college should be amply endowed, and it is hoped that much will be accomplished by the effort now being made. Bro. Gilcrest is a strong man, an experienced educator and able preacher. By securing his services the faculty is made stronger and the business interests of the college, it is believed, will be advanced.

Kidney Trouble Makes You Miserable.

Almost everybody who reads the newspapers is sure to know of the wonderful cures made by Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney, liver and bladder remedy.

It is the great medical triumph of the nineteenth century; dis-covered after years of scientific research by Dr. Kilmer, the eminent kidney and blad-der specialist, and is wonderfully successful in promptly curing lame back, kidney, bladder, uric acid trou-bles and Bright's Disease, which is the worst form of kidney trouble.

Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is not recommended for everything but if you have kidney, liver or bladder trouble it will be found just the remedy you need. It has been tested in so many ways, in hospital work, in private practice, among the helpless too poor to purchase relief and has proved so successful in every case that a special arrangement has been made by which all readers of this paper who have not already tried it, may have a sample bottle sent free by mail, also a book telling more about Swamp-Root and how to find out if you have kidney or bladder trouble. Dedication at Ambia, Ind.

Cone of the most successful dedications that it has ever been our pleasure to participate in, was the one at Ambia, Ind., on Lord's day, October 28th. The day was an ideal one. The attendance both morning and night was more than the house would hold.

The house itself is neat, comfortable and commodious, well finished and furnished, and well located. The singing and music were exceptionally

The giving was prompt and generous. Enough was raised to provide for all debts. The sister churches in the town, with their pastors, attended the dedication. Bro. Warren King, a preacher greatly beloved by the people of Ambia, as well as by the church, lives in Ambia. Bro. Lappin, who preaches for the church at Cheneysville, was at the dedication. With the new and better facilities for doing good work, the church at Ambia enters upon what we believe will be an era of great prosperity. Interesting, if True.

You Can Try It For Yourself and Prove It.

One grain of the active principle in Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest 3,000 grains of meat, eggs or other wholesome food, and this claim has been proven by actual experiment which anyone can perform for himself in the following manner: hard boiled eggs into very small pieces, as it would be if masticated, place the egg and two or three of the tablets in a bottle or jar containing warm water heated to 98 degrees (the temperature of the body) and keep it at this temperature for three and one-half hours, at the end of which time the egg will be as completely digested as it would have been in the healthy stomach of a hungry boy.

The point of this experiment is that what Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will do to the egg in the bottle it will do to the egg or meat in the stomach and nothing else will rest and invigorate the stomach so safely and effectually. Even a little child can take Stuart's Tablets with safety and benefit if its digestion is weak and the thousands of cures accomplished by their regular daily use are easily explained when it is understood that they are composed of vegetable essences, aseptic, pepsin, diastase and Golden Seal, which mingle with the food and digest it tooroughly, giving the over-worked stomach a chance to recuperate.

Dieting never cures dyspepsia, neither do pills and cathartic medicines, which simply irritate and inflame the intestines.

When enough food is eater and prompt'y digested there will be no constipation, nor in fact will there be disease of any kind because good digestion means good health in every organ.

The merit and success of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are world-wide and they are sold at the moderate price of 50 cents for full sized package in every drug store in the United States and Canada, as well as in Europe.

Correspondence.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

I have had some time this autumn to give to politics and have given it. To the best of my cnowledge and belief I had not heard a campaign peech since 1880 when I heard the Hon. D. W. Voorhees. I heard the Hon. William Jennings Bryan last year. While Mr. Bryan's oration was on affairs of state the speech was not delivered during political campaign, and so I do not count it as a ampaign speech. My experiences during the ast few weeks have been alike interesting, amusng and disgusting. I have been especially impressed with the familiar tone of the orators. When I was a small boy I now and again attended the circus and the political meeting. I soon saw hat the witticisms of the clowns were stereotyped. now put the clown in the circus and the political prator on the stump in the same personal category. The speakers in the years of long ago asanned their hearers in vociferous tones that if the candidate, or candidates, for whom the speakers stood was not, or were not, elected the most ter rible results would certainly follow. The men for whom a certain orator spoke were not elected nor did the unspeakably direful consequences follow. Not more than one-half of the candidates for office in any campaign can be elected; but all of them, with their friends, invariably assure us that this is the most important contest in which the people have been engaged since our Republic came into existence. This is what the stump orators said in '60, in '64, in '68, in '72, in '76 and in '80, at which time I became so disgusted that, as I have said, I have not heard a political speech for twenty years. Imagine, if you can, my surprise and disgust to hear the same old speeches in the electioneering campaign of 1900. It is the same old howl. The politicians have learned nothing in all this time. Their mental imbecility is amazing. Some men, it is true, are now political demi-gods who, in the sixties, were, without doubt, the embodiment of all evil. They are saints now; they were demons then. This change is noted. The cry of "Imperialism" to day is neither so loud nor so frantic as it was in former campaigns. The money question has been a "burning" issue -probably I ought to say "imminent" or "paramount"-for the last thirty years. Indeed this was the question at the time of "the Shays Rebellion" in New England. It is probable that for some time to come it will be a favorite topic of debate with certain classes of our fellow citizens.

The credulity of the people is marvelous. One incident of the campaigns, I believe, of '76 and '80 will serve to illustrate this. An orator, of more than national fame, spoke twice in one place -the two speeches separated by four years of time. In the first speech he told the people that but for his efforts and influence and those of his party associates specie payment would have been resumed and the country would at that moment be involved in financial ruin. The speech was applauded to the echo and the unselfish and heroic friend of the people was kept in office. He was continued in Congress for the express purpose of preventing the resumption of specie payment. Four years later this man stood in the same place and to substantially the same people told of the successful efforts that he and his friends in Congress had made to secure a resumption of specie payment. Again the people shouted and voted that this heroic, honest, unselfish person should be continued in office. At no time do the people manifest such a blind credulity as during the progress of our quadrennial political campaigns.

The selfishness and manifest insincerity of the political preachers impress me. If they are not dishonest then they are ignorant. There is, to me, no other conceivable way of accounting for their manipulation, or avoidance, of well-attested facts. This remark is not applicable exclusively to the representatives of any one party. Neither party has a monopoly of intelligence and honesty. There are good men and bad men, wise men and fools, in all the parties. This probably is not a safe thing to say in the midst of the present excitement-but I dare to say it since this letter will not be read until after the election! The man who is wrought up now on the subject of politics is sure that all, or almost all, the good men and great are in his party, and that all the small men and bad are in the other parties.

Have you thought how difficult it is to cast an intelligent ballot?

The demagogues manage to bring to the front questions that can only be understood by experts. These are made paramount issues. It is safer to say that in the present campaign there are no real issues. The so-called issues are invented for the occasion. They have been manufactured by the political wire-pullers and aspirants for office. The tariff, for illustration, is not now in debate, albeit it is as much an Issue as at any time since the formation of our government; but when it was a paramount issue, by the will of the demagogues, what did you know about it? What did you know about the monetary questions which were so much in evidence four years ago?

I may as well confess that I know nothing about the tariff and financial problems. Am I the biggest fool in America? Am I a greater simpleton than you are? I have tried to become intelligent on these topics by reading and conversation, but have failed. I know nothing about them; and I have a vague suspicion that the average man who is engaged in their discussion is in the same condition! It is not easy to cast an intelligent ballot. The average voter in the United States in 1900 will not do so. He will vote as his party managers dictate. Isn't this true?

A man of average intelligence can see the point in the real questions which from time to time he must, as a citizen, consider. My contention is that the political aspirants look about and get up issues for the purpose of blinding the people and leading them captive. The issues, socalled, in this campaign are not real-they are gotten up for effect. The same is true of almost every campaign. Now and again there are real questions, actual issues. There were, for instance, in 1860 and in 1864.

There are a dozen parties to-day asking the support of the American voters. There are the "Socialist Labor Party," the "Social Democracy," the "United Christian Party," the "People's Party," the "Middle of the Road Party," the "De Leon Socialist Party," the "Republican Party," the "Democratic Party," the "Silver Republican Party," the "National Party," the "Union Reform Party," and the "Prohibition Party." The candidates for the office of President of the United States are, Job F. Harriman, Eugene V. Debs, S. C. Swallow, William Jennings Bryan, Wharton Barber, Joseph F. Maloney, William McKinley, John G. Woolley, Donaldson Caffery, and Seth Ellis.

What, now, do you know about these men and the principles of these parties? B. B. T.

Hazel Green Mountain Mission.

Our mission at Hazel Green is in a more prosperous condition to-day than ever before. The enrollment of pupils in our academy is far ahead of that for any other fall term; it is more than 110 and the outlook for the winter and spring attendance is very flattering, the only question now is "How can we accommodate all who will come?" Our seating capacity will be full, and our boarding department will be overcrowded. During the ten years we have labored at this mission point, most of our pupils have come from counties other than Wolfe County, in which our school is located. We are glad of this, for we have not sought to do especially local work. Our aim is to reach out into the mountain country and get the young men and women, that they may be prepared to wield a wholesome influence in their respective communities.

The people of the mountains are strictly a rural people; they do not live in towns but stay u.on their mountain farms. We find the towns in the mountains small when compared with the towns of other parts, still we find the mountain country comparatively thickly populated. Our mission is to the mountain country more especially and not to the mountain town.

No one can estimate the value of the mission school in the mountains. Through such schools is the only true way to help the mountaineers Permanent work for Christ and the church is done in this way. Through our school courses we are not confined to text books or academic work, but we seek to lead our pupils into the broader light: we seek to bring them to Christ and his righteousness. We are pleased that our efforts, so far, have not been in vain, and the future is full of hope. The efforts put forth by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the mountains of Kentucky cannot be too highly commended, and we pray that their hands be upheld and their efforts be greatly strengthened. William A. Gardner.

W. A. Gardner was one of the most powerful preachers on the Pacific Coast during the past fifteen years. He was of Presbyterian parentage. His father was a physician and business man of sterling qualities. His mother was an ideal Christian character. He was born in Northville, Wayne county, Mich., August 8, 1846. His father's family moved to Kansas early in the fifties, and from that hot-bed of agitation he entered the Union army. At the age of eighteen he was mustered out, stricken with fever, and given up by army surgeons to die. During the long, weary days and nights of suffering in a poorly k-pt government hospital tent, he said: "I often wondered if I were one of those elected to everlasting life or death." He was removed to an acquaintance of the family, and it was there that he heard the simple gospel as preached by our people. He was obedient to the first gospel invitation he ever heard and was paptized by Pardee Butler in Celar Creek, Doniphan county, Kan., March 25, 1865. About two years afterward he was officially set apart for the ministry

His education, begun in Michigan, was carried on after his recovery at Highland University. He taught school in Kansas and Northwest Missouri. At a later time he spent one year in Drake University. His residence was Oregon, Hol; county, Mo., for more than fifteen years. There he was married twice; first to Annie Springer in 1870, who lived only five years, leaving one son, John E., then to Mary Springer, who bore him two sons and two daughters. There he was clerk of the Circuit Court for a term or two. But he preached regularly at Oregon, Mound City, Bethel, Filmore, Old Union, Garnee and other points. He held many successful protracted meetings both in Kansas and Missouri. There were over one hundred added to the Filmore Church in one meeting.

In 1886 he came to California and was state evangelist. In two years spent in Humboldt country, he organized three congregations, built three churches, giving liberally of his own money. The next ten years completed his earthly course and he crowded into them more work for the Master than any one I ever knew. January, 1890, he was called to the Woodland, Cal., Church. Four hundred were added to the congregation during a pastorate of four and a half years

The West Side, San Francisco, Church was organized and he was selected as its pastor when the church numbered twenty. The first year saw a net increase of one hundred, and this number was annually added each year. This was but a part of his labor. No more faithful pastor ever visited his people. It was in the sick-room and with those in trouble and bereavement that he was most efficient. He usually held two protracted meetings each year, always with large ingatherings. During these years he was a member of the State Board, and three years its president. What with his work as associate editor of the Pacific Christian, treasurer of Berkeley Bible Seminary, and the settlement of various church difficulties, his was a busy and useful life.

In the midst of such toil and service, while holding a meeting at Concord, Cal., he was attacked with pleurisy. For eight weeks he fought for his life and gained a truce for nearly two years. After a period of rest he accepted a call to the Honolulu Church, going thither hopeful of complete recovery in that milder climate. For a year he worked with his accustomed zeal and success. He estimated the year's work as one of the most important of his life. His hopes of recuperation were not fulfilled. He saw he must return to California, if he was ever again on earth to see his two children and sister Net-

Just then the plague broke out in Honolulu. He, with his wife and two children, was detained three months. While in quarantine, expecting soon to sail, they were invited to spend the last days on the islands at a sister's home. She sent them many costly presents of fabric. On Monday they were to go to her home. Sunday they received a telephone message, saying it was not possible for them to do so. Monday morning's paper announced she, had the plague, and Tuesday she was a corpse, and her beautiful home condemned by the authorities and burned. These were anxious days. Finally the long sea voyage was begun with hardly strength enough to endure it, and when he landed at home his friends saw his work was done. After a few days at home in San Francisco, at the invitation and advice of his faithful friend, Dr. C. E. Beebe, he went to Watsonville. For a time he seemed to improve, but was suddenly overmastered by disease, and he was at the end of his earthly journey. He died April 5, 1900, at the age of 53 years, surrounded by his wife, sister Nettie, two sons and two daughters; one infant son preceded him home.

He was a life member of the Foreign Missionary Society and the Missouri State Missionary Society. He left $500 life insurance to the Berkelty Bible Seminary. He had the ability to make money, and what he made he gave to the Lord's work, for he left but little aside from a moderate life insurance.

As a preacher he took high rank. He made no pretensions to scholarship, but was able to move an audience as I never saw any one else do One intelligent man who had heard Charles G. Fitney, said Bro. Gardner was of the same type.

His home was a delight to him. He loved his family greatly, and never failed to demonstrate his affection. No one ever appealed in vain to him. No impure word ever escaped his lips. No man ever had a truer friend than W. A. Gardner Nearly his last written word in his diary is an outline of an address to young men, why they ought to pr ach the gospel. W. A. Gardner was the simplest and greatest man I ever knew.

Reorganization of Board of School of Pastoral Helpers.

The committee on School of Pastoral Helpers met in Kansas City during the convention. The report of the work by A. M. Harvuot showed ten young women in the school and the work progressing finely.

It was decided to elect a board of 15 members. five of whom should live in or near Cincinnati, who should constitute an executive committee to whom all the details of work should be committed.

The Board is as follows: F. D. Power, chairman, Washington, D. C.; Geo. Darsie, Frank'ort. Ky.; A. B. Philputt, Indianapolis, Ind; E. W Darst, Texas; T. E. Cramlett, Pittsburg; H. L. Willett, Chicago; H. O. Breeden, Des Moines; W. B Taylor, Chicago; Mrs Jesssie Brown Pounts, Cleveland, O.; Mrs. J. H. Garrison, St. Louis; J. H. Fillmore, Cincinnati; S M. Cooper, Cincinnati; T. M. Worcester, Cincinnat; A. M. Harvuot, Cincinnati; Geo. A. Miller, Covington, Ky. The last five constitute the executive committee. They were instructed to apply for a charter and take some measure to raise all money needed to carry on the work of the school.

The school received much encouragement in the conference of the Pastors and Evangelists and by private talks with the three teachers present: M. Harvuot, Lettie S. Nichol and Geo. A. Miller. Already some have arranged to enter next term which begins Jan. 15, and many more are arranging to enter next year. Bro. Harvoot has received five applications from city pastors to recommend helpers in the past three weeks.

Take a Record.

SEE HOW MANY FRIENDS ARE HURT BY COFFEE.

It would be just as ressonable for a temperance advocate to drink a little diluted whiskey as to drink coffee, for one is as tru'y intexicant as the other, and persistence in the use of coffee brings on a variety of chronic diseases, notorious among which are dyspepsia, heart palpitation (and ultimately heart failure), frequently constipation, kidney diseases, many cases of weak eyes and trembing conditions of the nerves.

This is only a small percentage of the great variety of diseases which come from an unbalanced nervous system, caused by the persi tent daily use of the drug caffe'ne, which is the active principle of coffee. Another bit of prima facie evidence about coffee is that the victims to the habit find great difficulty in giving it up.

They will solemnly pledge to themselves day after day that they will abandon the use of it, when they know that it is shortening their days, but morning after morning they fail, until they grow to despise themselves for their lack of control.

Any one interested in this subject would be greatly surprised to make a systematic inquiry among promin nt brain workers in America. There are hundreds of thousands of our most prominent people that have abandoned coffee altogether and are using Postum Food Coffee in its place, and for the most excellent reasons in the world. Many of them testify that ill health, nervous prostration. and consequent inability to work, has in times past pushed them back and out of their proper standing in life, which they have been able to regain by the use of good health, strong nerves, and great vitality, since coffee has been thrown out and the Postum put in its place.

New York Letter.

B. Q. Denham's report of the first year's service in the church on West 56th Street is encouraging: "Total expenses, $5,969.95. Received from Sunday offerings, $3,994.75; Easter offering, $1,124.00; total, $5,118.75. Deficit for the year, $851.20. We had some extraordinary expenses in connection with organ and building, amounting to $650, without which our deficit would have been $201.20. For some time the deficit has anged annually between $1,200 and $1,500. We ind reason for encouragement that, with extra expenses, we have cut the deficit down to $851.20. Even this must be wiped out another year. Missionary offerings of Church, Sunday-school and Y. P. S. C. E., $970.60, and C. W. B. M. $255.69; grand total for missions, $1,226.30. Here are the total amounts raised for four years, for all purposes, showing some $700 more the past year than the highest for the other three years: 1897, $4,637.70; 1898, $5,689.33; 1899, $5,666.82; 1900, $6,374.09. If we include the C. W. B. M., the grand total for 1900 is $6,629.78.

"Gross gain in membership, 83; loss, 19; net gain, 34, being 20 percentum, net. Present membership 314. The C. W. B. M. grew from a membership of 42 to 109. The Y. P. S. C. E. has 62 members, representing a large increase. The Ladies' Aid Society shows a gain of 10 active and two honorary members, making present membership, active, 26, honorary 12.

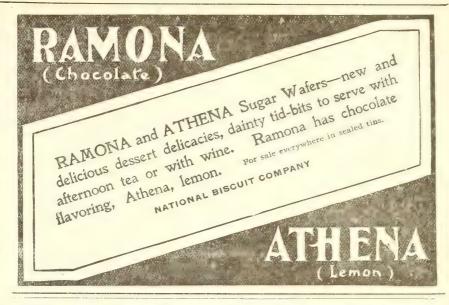

"The Sunday-school, while not showing material increase, reports a more steady and larger attendance during the summer just past than for two or three years."

He does not state how many of these were added to the Lord by confession and baptism, or how many were added to congregation by letter.

J. M. Philputt, of the Lenox Ave. Union Church, makes quite a good showing also in his annual report. The total receipts for year ending Oct. 1st were, $5,675.03. Of this s.m., some of the chief amounts are: Church treasurer, $4,589.72; S. S., $475.63; Y. P. S. C. E., $575.63; C. W. B. M., $104.56. This is a gain over the previous year of $1,335.48. We do not know how much of this goes to missions. The present membership, 294; total number of additions, 56; losses, 25; net gain, 31. Miss Dalzell, who is the church visitor, made 4,500 calis during the year. R. E. Carpenter is the new "lay assistant to the pastor," and will give his entire time to the work of the church.

The Newark mission starts off encouragingly this fall. R. E. Shepherd, a student in Columbia University, has become the regular minister and is already on the field. The Church Extension Board has granted them a loan of $3,750 and the Amercan Christian Missionary Society has appropriated $600 toward the salary on the condition that Newark people put $1,500 into a chapel for the home of this work. It will be done and the little church in Newark will soon become a host in the work of the Lord. If any one reading this knows of a disciple of Christ in Newark or vicinity, and will drop a card to R. E. Shepherd, care E. L. Kelland, 24 North 7th St., Newark, N. J., the party will be sought out and made welcome at their services.

Dr. W. S. Crowe, Unitarian, of this city, in speaking last Sunday of the Chinese trouble, said the best thing that can be done is for all the mission boards to recall the missionaries. He also said the commission of Christ to his disciples, so-called, was read into the gospels in the second century as a justification of evangelistic zeal, which characterized the church at that time. Perhaps Dr. Crowe says this in justification of the lack of evangelistic fervor among the Unitarians and the Universalists. It's a poor rule that won't work both ways, especially when it concerns a matter you can twist about to suit yoursel(! But the strange part of it is that some men who pose as learned, show themselves unlearned by saying that the best scholars agree in the opinion that Christ never gave a commission to his disciples to evangelize the world. Such a commission he did give and under it we live and labor. We should see to it that we are true to the trust committed to our hands.

An Explanation.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—May I ask a little space in your columns for a few words of explanation on the part of the Kansas City brethren regarding our late National Convention. So many kind and appreciative words have been spoken and written that we would not ask to make any such statement, had it not been for an editorial in the Christian Guide, which shows that the facts were not known by all our brethren who attended the convention, and that we are being censured for what was in no sense our fault. I beg to call attention to the following facts:

1. When we invited the convention to Kansas City at the Jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, we had Convention Hall, seating 20,000 people, engaged, and expected to return from Cincinnati, if successful in securing the convention, and at once sign the contract for it. But that convention, thinking to force the Western Passenger Association to grant a one fare rate, voted to hold the convention in Kansas City, only on condition that such rate be secured, the Acting Board being instructed, in the event of failure, to take the convention into the territory of the Central Association. On our return to Kansas City we laid the facts before the managers of Convention Hall, who held the hall for us several weeks, while we waited for the action of the railway association. They were finally compelled to rent it for other purposes, because we could not assure them that our convention would come to Kansas City. When the Western Association at last voted against giving the one-fare rate, the Acting Board considered the question of taking the convention elsewhere, as instructed by the Jubilee Convention. The Kansas City brethren hoped they would do this, as we knew we could not entertain it as we had expected when we invited it. The board finally concluded it was best to come here anyway, and asked us to make the best arrangements we could.

2. We learned that a new building, containing a large hall, was to be built downtown, and we promptly engaged it; but labor strikes delayed ts beginning, and the owner finally decided to make it an office building, instead of a ball, and we were again without a place of meeting. The Boards of the Home and Foreign Societies then determined to arrange simultaneous programs, and hold the convention in sections in a group of churches. About the time they got these programs arranged, we found that it was possible to secure Armory Hall, used by the Third Regiment for drill purposes, and with the approval of the Boards we did so.

3. This hall was used by the regiment for its drills up to the night before our convention began, and we could not get possession till Thursday morning, October 11th. Save the building of the platform, everything done to fit the hall for the convention was done after seven o'clock Thursday morning. It is not surprising if everything was not in "apple-pie" order. We regret that the hall had no vestibule, and we therefore could not furnish space for the displays of our publishing houses, our colleges, and other interests. These we supplied at headquarters at the First Christian Church, which was the best we could do. As to the acoustics of the hall, we know they were not perfect; but there was no complaint when the Mills and Wharton meetings were held there, and if quiet could have been maintained in the rear of the hall, which is difficult without vestibules, there would have been little complaint on that score. As to committee rooms, toilet rooms, check room and postoffice, the facilities were perhaps as good as the average convention enjoys. As to accommodations in homes, we did the best we could, but no doubt some delegates were not as comfortable as we would have made them, had we known persocally every home to which we assigned them. We did the best we could, and are willing to bear any censure that may rightly belong to us. But for the hall, we are not responsible.

"Elijah," by M. M. Davis, is the latest book from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. Mr. Davis is favorably known to our patrons as the author of "Queen Esther," a volume which has attained a deserved popularity, and has received the highest commendation. "Elijah" is a companion book to "Queen Esther," being uniform in style and binding. In this volume the author treats of the life and work of the great prophet. Mr. Davis is a close student of the Bible, and this work will give the reader a better conception of the character and works of the prophet than he has hitherto had. 201 pages, cloth. Price, 75 cts.

From Hillsburg to Halifax.

AMONG THE BLUENOSES.

Turned my back upon Quebec and its lovely scenery, and boarding a train on the Intercolonial Railway at Levis on the opposite side of the great St. Lawrence, I commenced the journey toward Truro—beautiful Truro where I was born and grew to manhood—situated at the head of the Bay of Fundy in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Our route was through the Northern region of the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. The time between Quebec and Truro was a little over eighteen hours. In passing over this Northern country there is little, indeed, of interest to the traveler. The land is about as poor as any to be found in the Dominion, and on this account much of it is still under a thick growth of timber, consisting of spruce, fir and cedar, interspersed with the white birch. The moose, caribou, bear, and even the deer, are yet quite plentiful in these forests.

In this land of the spruce tree, it is not necessary to drop a penny in a slot machine every time you desire a quid of gum. If you have learned the art of climbing, all that is needed is to climb one of these spruce trees, and there you get the genuine article-used by our forefathers and foremothers clear back to the original pairwithout money and without price; none of your Yankee store gum, manufactured out of old rubber shoes, and the hoofs of horses, and sweetened and scented up to deceive the taste of the unwary. but the pure, wholesome blood of the stately spruce tree. To sit in a railway coach, in this region, and for hours witness the sublime performance of a company of nice-looking young ladies and gentlemen chewing their cuds of spruce gum is the treat of a lifetime.

The Intercolonial Railway system, including nearly all the railways in these maritime provinces, and extending as far West as Montreal, has been built, is owned and run most satisfactorily by the Dominion government, showing the feasibility of the government own rship of such public works. The government does not aim to make money out of the road.

Nova Scotia is a land of mountains and minerals, fine forests and good timber, beautiful rivers and clear lakes, fine fish and good fruits; some farm land as fertile, and some as poor, as the sun ever shone upon; dense fogs, and a large and healthy race of people, called by the blueblooded Bostonians "Bluenoses," not because their noses are any bluer than Yankee noses, or out of respect for the Nova Scotlans, but after a certain "Bluenose" potato which Nova Scotians many years ago furnished New Englanders in immense quantities.

In speaking of Nova Scotia fog, I am reminded of the fact that there is only one other place on the continent where a denser article of that commodity is produced, and that is St. John, New Brunswick. A story is told of a man there, not much accustomed to working in Bay of Fundy fogs, who undertook to shingle the roof of his house one foggy day, and before he knew "where he was at" he had shingled ten feet beyond the comb of his roof.

I have now been over a month in Nova Scotia, visiting old-time friends I have not seen for upwards of thirty-five years, "climbing the mountain way steep and walking the shadowy vale," tramping through forests primeval, fishing the speckled trout in laughing stream and silvery lake, and preaching somewhere every Sunday to thoughtful, sober audiences that would think it almost a sin to even smile in a religious meeting. I thought I was coming to my old home to rest, but it seems to me the longer I stay the more tired I am becoming.

I have already been within a few miles of Halifax, but did not enter. Among other places in the province where I have had most delightful visits is the Annapolis Valley, known now as "the land of Evangeline." No finer spot can be found in North America than this valley, made famous by Longfellow's Evangeline. American tourists, who visit this locality in great numbers, are charmed with its delightful scenery and healthful climate. This sec ion is fitly termed "the garden of Nova Scotia" and is destined to become a fine summer resort. Charles Dudley Warner, in his "Baddock," did both it and the province an injustice in speaking of it as "a very stony garden." All this scope of country in the vicinity of Minas Basin is exceedingly free from stones, and fertile in the extreme Some land here is worth as high as four hundred dollars an

Nearly all the land around Minas Basin has been reclaimed from the Bay of Fundy tides, by means of levees, which have been built at considerable cost, to shut out the tides, which rise and fall upwards of sixty feet in some places. When the French Acadians were being driven from here in the time referred to by the port Lingfellow, they cut the levees they had built, allowing the tides to again flood the country. We saw a part of one of these original embankments in a good state of preservation.

A few houses, called the village of Grandpre, mark the spot where stood the original Grandpre. The house where Evanzeline lived, and even the old well sweep with which she drew water, are still pointed out to the confiding tourist. Longfellow never saw this section of country. He got the material for his Evangeline from Hawthrone, who in turn had learned the principal facts contained in the poem from some of the Acadians who had been deported and sent to New England by the British. With some few exceptions the poet has given a correct description of this lovely section of country and it bays. Cape Blamedan, rising almost perpendicularly four hundred feet above the Bay, and standing as a mighty sentinel guarding the Bay and country, is almost the first object that the eye of the expectant traveler rests upon on reaching this peculiar section of country.

The tides that ebb and flow in Minas Basin

The tides that ebb and flow in Minas Basin and its rivers and creeks, are a great curiosity to those unused to the Bay of Fundy. When the tide is out of some of these rivers, the small boy came ford them where the largest stips enter with ease when the tide is in.

A Chemist Speaks

OF PREDIGESTED FOOD.

"After having tested and tried every form of predigested food on the market, and experimenting in my own family, my attention was attracted to an article headed 'Brawny Scots' Diet,' mentioning eggs and Grape Nuts. I carefully tested the new food and finally began its use in my family, with most gratifying results.

"My little boy at that time was a pale, anæmic child and very poorly nourished. Now, thanks to Grape-Nuts, he is as fine a specimen of infantile strength as I could wish for. My own personal experience means much to me. For some years I was troubled with dyspepsia; that is, I could not eat bread or any preparation of bolted wheat flour such as cake or any of the starchy preparations, without a fit of indigestion, sour stomach, costiveness and headache.

"As soon as I quit that sort of food and used Grape-Nuts, which has the starchy part predigested, I began to recover. The change has been remarkable. I formerly weighed 122 pounds and now weigh 137. Am strong, have more nerve force than I ever possessed, appetite perfect, sleep sound and can endure any amount of work. I know exactly where the change has come from and it is from your truly scientific and wonderful food, which is worthy of the highest commendation."—Chas. P. Prior, C. of P. Class '94, Middletown, N. About Soap Better buy B. T. Babbitt's Best Soap, if you want soap, your money's worth of soap, the soap that does soap's full work, does it the quickest, does it the easiest, does it without hurting hands or clothes, and lasts the longest, very much the longest, long-life soap, the kind that's economical.

Texas Letter.

A. J. Bush, who for years has been in the employ of our State Board, has resigned and located at Hubbard City. Since that frightful storm his family is not willing to have him away from them.

D. A. Leak, another of our state evangelists, has been very near death's door, but is now, it is believed, on the road to recovery. He is a strong man and a noble character.

J. G Huddleston for seven months has been on the sick list, but he has gone to Mineral Wells, and it is hoped that he will soon be himself again. He is one of our best men.

Miss Mary Graybell is touring Texas in the interest of the C. W. B. M. work, and she is receiving that warm welcome which she so richly deserves.

J. C. Mason, who has been in Houston about eleven years, changes to Palestine. We are surprised at this, for we had come to think of Mason and Houston as one and inseparable. But alas: we do not have many things of that kind down here. Sister Mason's health demanded the change. Bro. Mason did a truly great work there, and he will repeat it in Palestine.

R. R. Hamlin changes from Palestine to Plano; another surprise, for has successful ministry up to the very last sermon showed that he was still a power among his people. He has a fine field in Plano and God will continue to bless his labors.

The Austin meeting, in which S. M. Martin assisted the pastor, J. W. Lowber, was a success. There were 31 additions, and Bro. Lowber says, "We have really had a good meeting."

The Huntsville brethren, under the leadership of the talented E. C. Boynton, are striving to build a church. The State Normal School is there, and hence it is a place of great importance.

The Girls' Home, one of the handsomest buildings in the state, is nearing completion. It is a part of our Add Ran University buildings, and designed for our girls. Present indications justify the hope that it will be full the first year. T. E Shirley, aided by a few kindred spirits is pushing this great enterprise, and it will succeed. Prof Snow, the new president of the school, is aggressive and hopeful, and the prospect is better than ever before. And what is true of Add-Ran is true of all our Texas schools.

The storm-swept region of our state is gradually recovering from the awful shock, and Hope. with her fair, sweet face, is seen amid the ruins and desolation, encouraging the people to rally and retrieve their lost fortunes. The warm heart o the world at large has poured generous offeriogs at the feet of the sufferers and relieved their wants, and now that same world is urging them to buckle on the armor and try again. The merchants have all needed credit tendered them, and an atmosphere of cheerfulness pervades the city Our congregations are having their houses rebuil and the scattered flocks are being sheltered once more in the old folds Bro. Haston's visit among the churches was an ovation, so gladly did the brethren welcome and aid him. M. M. DAVIS.

Drippings from the Pacific.

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: -Time speeds away! It is now twenty years since the "Drippings from the Springs" greeted the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Then the Drippings flowed from those health giving springs at the foot of Pike's Peak. For ten years I have been on the head waters of the great Mississippi in Minnesota, trying to dispense the water of life to the dwellers of that land of sky-tinted waters. It has been a source of great joy and profit to me to become acquainted with those beautiful lakes and rivers that unite to form the great Father of Waters. The beautiful Minnesota, the great Minnetonka, the falling Minneopa, and the laughing Minnehaha, are beautiful symbols of those crystal waters that unite to form that river "the streams whereof make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High."

We closed our three years' pastorate at Olivia, Minn., the last of August. Twelve additions crowned our closing service the last week-all by confession and baptism. Eleven of these were Sundayschool scholars. For nearly two years we had practiced the combined service of church and Bible school, on Sanday mornings. It was a success from the time we adopted it to the close of our ministry there, and resulted in the baptism of nearly every scholar old enough to confess the Savior. The service was left in charge of Bros. Perry Burch and M. P. Givens, both splendid students of the blessed Book, and efficient helpers in the Lord's work. It was my privilege and pleasure to attend the state convention at St. Paul, the last day of August. I also had the extreme gratification of seeing some of my children in the gospel taking part in the convention work, and gradually developing into substantial leaders in the commonwealth of Israel.

The transfer from Minnesota to Washington, nearly two thousand miles, over plains, mountains, hills, brooks, vales, fruitful fields and evergreen trees, was an experience never to be forgotten. It was like the journey of life from infancy to youth and old age. In Minnesota we left the sweet flowers, fruits and fields, representing the sweetness and purity of childhood. In the Dakotas and Montana we passed through the barren plains and bad lands, representing the prodigality of life. In the mountains we passed through the dark tunnel and emerged into the glorious light of day, representing our translation out of the kingdom of darkness into the glorious light of liberty of the children of God. Leaving the tunnel we passed through the verdant hills and fauitful vales, where the atmosphere was laden with the sweet perfume of beautiful flowers, and where the reapers were gathering the ripen-d sheaves from the golden harvest field, all of which reminded us of the sweet and holy atmosphere of the kingdom of God and the ever ripening sheaves that are gathered by the augels for the Harvest Home in heaven. Our journey brought us to a goodly land and to a Waitsburg is warm-hearted and godly people. Waitsburg is located in the south-ast corner of Washington, at the foot of the Blue Mountains. The climate is ideal, the hills and valleys fertile, and the orchards bear twelve manner of fruits. We closed our work in Minnesota the last Lord's day in August and began here the first Lord's day in September. A church of 250 members greeted us the first day. The same day there were four additions by letter and two more by letter since. The prospects for a great and good work are before us DAVID HUSBAND.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: - In a copy of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST dated Oct. 18, J. K. Speer, in an article entitled "The Preacher and the Congregation" says: "Do not ask or expect the preacher to do much visiting, as this is found in these days not so profitable as are good, sound and educational sermons Sunday morning and evening." In our city schools the teacher is required to go out onto the play-ground for a definite time each day with the children of her room, that she may know better how to teach and to help the children; the missionary can better teach the Hindoo after going to India where he lives; the college professor of to-day who is most successful is one among his students: the roadside house and social settlements are solving the problem of the city slums. How can a preacher tell what a man needs most by only seeing him twice on Lord's day and then often at a distance? For myself, I must know something more of my people than ribbons, silks, jewelry and broadcloth, which are prominent articles in some of our churches at Lord's day services. I must go among my congregation, first, because the Master would have me bear with him their burdens; second, because after knowing their home life, I can better supply their needs on the first day of the week. In my short ministry I find that the human family has changed but very little

~1901~

For many years The Christian Lesson Commentary has been the favorite help of the great majority of the leading Sunday-school workers among the Disciples of Christ. The volume for 1900 had a much larger circulation than ever before. The leading publishing house of another religious body ordered Oue Thousand Copies to be used by the workers of their denomination. This same house is now contracting for Two Thousand Copies of the volume for 1901.

The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901 is better than ever before. It is the very best aid for Sunday-school superintendents and teachers and for advanced scholars that has ever been published. It is a handsome volume of 429 octavo pages, beautifully and substantially bound in cloth, printed upon good paper. It contains plain, practical, helpful expositions of the International Sunday-school Lessons for 1901—an average of about eight pages being devoted to each lesson. As an appendix it has a Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, with their pronunciation and meaning. It contains chronological tables of the Life of Christ and of the Old Testament. It is profusely illustrated, there being a total of One Hundred and Sixty-eight pictures, maps, blackboard designs, nted in colors. There is also included a carefully etc. Some of the maps are printed in colors. There is als prepared Order of Exercises for each quarter.

WILLIAM W. DOWLING, author of THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY, is easily first among the writers of Sunday-school literature among the Disciples of Christ. In this work he has been continuously engaged for over thirty years. He thoroughly understands the nature, needs and requirements of the youthful mind, and is peculiarly adapted to the work to which he has devoted his life. His work grows constantly better as the years go by, as will be readily appreciated by those who secure the COMMENTARY for 1901.

The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901 will be mailed to any address, postpaid, on receipt of One Dollar. This is a cheap price for so excellent a book. This is a volume that is necessarily handled a great deal, and is in constant use. We believe our patrons prefer to pay one dollar for a book that is strongly bound and will stand constant using rather than to pay a few cents less for a poorly-bound volume that will come to pieces before the year is half gone.

Single Copy, prepaid, $1.00. Per Dozen, not prepaid, $9.00.

Orders for THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY should be sent as soon as possible, that teachers and workers may have the book in time to prepare for the first Sunday of the New Year.

Virginia Convention.

The annual convention of the churches of Christ in Virginia will meet in Seventh Street Church, Richmond, November 13-16, 1900.

Program. An excellent program, one worthy of a great Convention, has been prepared. The session of the Ministerial Association on Tuesday promises to be the best one we have ever had. The Christian Endeavor rally, the Conference on State Work, and the Sunday-school symposium are some of the special features of the program.

In addition to the preaching brethren of the state, Brothers C. P. Williamson and J. H. Garrison will address the convention. Mr. Charles M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," and of Endeavor fame, will also make an address in the Christian Endeavor rally.

Reduced Rates. Rates of a fare and a third have been secured over the railroads. Tickets will be sold on 12th, 13th and 14th. Final limit for return will be the 19th. The N. & W. will simply sell round-trip tickets. The C. & O., A. C. L., S. A. L., R., F. & P., and Southern will sell tickets on the certificate plan. Full fare is paid coming, and, at your request, a certificate will be given you by which to secure one-third rate in return. Remember you must secure certificate if you expect reduced rates in returning.

Entertainment. Entertainment for all delegates will be kindly provided by the churches in Richmond and Manchester. The committee desires all who expect to attend the convention to send their names to the chairman, W. G. Puller. Richmond, Va. On arrival, come directly to Seventh Street Church. You will there be assigned to a home for lodging and breakfast. Dinner and supper luncheons will be served at the church.

Reasons for Attending. The convention needs you. You need the enthusiasm, inspiration and helpful fellowship of the convention. You should come-to meet your faithful brethren, to hear the splendid addresses, to learn of the plans of the State Work, and to help in counsel for greater things, joining heart and hand. Every congregation is urged to appoint delegates. The ministers and evangelists should place the claims of the convention before the churches. Fire their hearts to attend. A more general and larger representation from churches and districts is expected this year. Certainly the preachers will come. The importance of their presence is urgent. Let the congregation send its preacher. He is due this thoughtful courtesy. We count on the cooperation of the preachers in every way. Kind reader, will you not give us your presence and help at the convention? We count on you for this. Do not disappoint us.

Nebraska News.

The greatest event of the present year in our own church work in Nebraska was the State Convention, held at Bethany during the last days of August and the first days of September. It easily ranked as the best convention ever held in Nebraska by our people. More than 400 delegates were present from a distance. Enthusiasm ran high. A spirit of hopefulness and good cheer pervaded the atmosphere. Unlike former years the convention was held in a tent. Instead of being entertained in the homes of the entertaining church, we all entertained ourselves in our own homes. Every one pitched his own tent. During the coming year a corresponding secretary is to be employed for full time. Until such a man is found as the state board wants for that position, Bro. W . A. Baldwin is to look after the interests of the State Missionary Board Bro. Baldwin has the thanks of the brotherhood throughout the state for his faithful work during the past years. He has been a most efficient secretary.

On Sept 10, 11, Cotner University opened its doors for another year's work. The attendance is fully up to what it was expected to be. The Dis ciples of our state and adjoining ones must now, more than ever, stand by this institution. The problem before us now is, how to endow the school. It must be endowed or die. Being conscious of this fact its friends are planning for its endowment. While this is being done the running expenses of the school are to be met by the tuition paid by the students and a special incidental fund that is being raised by five and ten dollar pledges, paid in installments during the next five years. The prospects of the school were never brighter.

Some recent changes among the churches are: Geo. M. Reed from Valparaiso to Seward; Ithe Bethany church has called William Sumpter to its pastorate; W. B. Harter has given up the work at Aurora to locate elsewhere; Bro. T. P. Beal leaves Elwood to take the work at Minden.

Bro. S. A. Kopp has organized a new church at Newhope, Boyd county, with 17 charter members. The greatest meeting held in Nebraska for some years is just about to close. It was held at Tekamah by Bro. J. S. Beem, as evangelist, and Garrie Smith, as singer. Over 100 have taken their stand in favor of the Church of Christ.

The leaves swing yellow, and the flowers wither, The wind sighs frost through trembling maple trees; The sun sinks lower, and the shadows lengthen, While sad decay rides on each passing breeze.

Down in the grove large flocks of birds are gath'ring,

Preparing for their annual southward flight; They seem to whisper words of farewell fondness, As when to parents children say "good-right."

The huntsman with his pointer finds the stubble, Bob White is calling in the field away; Anon the deep, resounding roar of shot-gun Tells surely he's begun the deadly fray.

The ripened fruit smiles through the golden orchards,

The farmer's busy housing in his grain;
The cow-bells ring a requiem for October,
As lazily the herds browse in the lane.

The air is streaked with chilly waves from North land.

Mixed half with those of bright and sunny climes; While from the crippled music of the summer Come limping discords through the autumn chimes.

The slumb'rous sun hangs drows'ly in the heavens, The sky is tinged with rays of sombre hue; The beetle's hum has in it all the meaning That now we must to summer say adieu.

Then farewell to the fading days of brightness, We bless them for their warm and happy cheer; And now we turn to face the season gloomy, For every sign doth tell November's near.

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chapter II .- Church Loyalty.

The Baptist people have a day each month for attending to business concerns. It is called Church Meeting Day. It is a sensible and business-like arrangement, for it comes on Saturday, and thus relieves the Sunday services from all wrangles that might cause a disturbance of the serious duties of Lord's day worship. It is opened with prayer, presided over by a moderator, and carefully recorded by the church clerk. This session came on two days after the visit of Squire Lee, and as an ominous silence, denoting a profound mystery of some sort, was in the air, the attendance was uncommonly large. As Job was more than usually busy in the shop that day he did not attend. The squire, however, was on hand, and his pious face indicated that he had a duty to perform of quite a serious nature. As to-morrow was "preaching day," Reverend Henry was present, and his prayer for the Baptist church was especially ardent. "Help us, Holy Father, to be true to the church! Help us, that all we do may add to its usefulness and may build up our Zion's walls, that they may be even like the mountains 'round about Jerusalem!"

were read and approved, and the order of business followed. When "matters of discipline" was reached, Brother Lee arose and solemnly addressed the chair. "I am sorry, Brother Moderator, to reveal a matter that demands our immediate attention. You that are in the Men's Class at Sundayschool will remember a question asked by Prof. Guthrie, and answered by our beloved Brother Norris. I was anxious over that matter, for I did not believe such answers good for this church. I used to be a good deal with the Campbellites at the countyseat, and I have heered them say the very thing he said about close communion. So I was afeared he might have them kind o' sentiments, and I went around to see him in his shop. He was gentlemanly and polite, and I believe he is honest, but he handles the Scriptures precisely the way them people do."

The squire went on and detailed the whole conversation, Scripture, emphasis, earnestness of the blacksmith and all. And when through, he moved that Bro. Norris be excluded. Bro. Revell seconded the motion, and it was about to be put before the house; but the young minister said he would like to move an amendment. "I know this family so well, and they are so useful in our church, that I fear excluding them will not only be treating them unjustly, but it will almost certainly do our own selves an injury. It is not quite fair or according to our American ideas to punish a man without giving him a chance to defend himself. So I move to amend that motion by the appointing of a committee of three to wait on Bro. Norris and pray with him and expostulate with him, before punishment." The squire accepted the amendment and Job shaped his second accordingly. The motion carried, and the minister and the two zealous men of the motion were appointed as the said committee. As this proceeding had created some excitement, there was but little more business attended to. Indeed, the scandalous conduct of Dr. Zachary was neglected, or forgotten, and the meeting adjourned to the next regular day.

This doctor was an illiterate scamp who had joined the church for popularity's sake, and who served the devil every hour for filty Lucre's sake. He lied to the preacher when he professed to know his sins were forgiven. He cheated the medical experts when he obtained his license to practice medicine, and literally turned in nothing of his own, except the necessary dollars, in consideration for the great honor of a medical college diploma. Having an industrious and business-like way, and rather a prevailing cheek, he got the diploma and the license and went to practicing, although scarcely able to read and wholly unable to spell or use good English. For instance, he counseled the teacher's wife to not weary, when he meant worry. The teacher, discerning this and other evidences of ignorance, called another physician. This made Zachary so angry that he doubled the amount of the teacher's bill, and boasted before him that he was in the medical business for the money there is in it, and he wanted people to know he always got the money.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

This buncombe boast was at the tabl where both men were eating supper. It i best shown in the wretched criminal's own words: "I brung in a dozen chickens las Nobody appeared to care for this but as no one spoke, the quack went or "They wuz all the feller had, too!" Still n response. "That wuzn't all, neither; I tool his feather bed, 'n 'is wife wuz a-lavin' o' it, sick!" With this he looked up with an in describably satisfied expression such as Dant could fancy overspreading the faces of th fiends of Inferno. So incensed was Prof Guthrie that he fairly blazed with indigna tion. "Hold on, you wretch! Do not tel us another word of that criminal process-It is unworthy of the company you are it and we do not want any more of it!"

The doctor turned about, just a littl subdued, but with gall enough to repeat th boast recorded above. "I generally allu git my money!"

Prof. Guthrie had been at some pains t

repare this recital to report at the church neeting; but so very important was the ase of disloyalty to Baptist usage, as Bro. Vorris's actions were called, that the modrator failed to call it up and the meeting djourned, leaving it unnoticed. eacher was now more than ever the friend f the accused; but he himself had a high egard for church loyalty, and believed the hurch would do right. He dropped in at he shop to counsel moderation. But when e found him perfectly placid and not at ll extreme in any of his utterances, he ound himself disarmed and unable to raise note of protest. He went further on his vay newly and strongly drawn to Job Torris's Christian courage.

On Monday the committee called, Job had d the Sunday-school class just as usual; ad attended the services following, and ondered somewhat at the minister's extra ouches on church loyalty; had noticed with touch of pain the shy manner of Rev. lenry, who had always been so very corial; had felt the nearness and fellowship f Prof. Guthrie and his wife, and had wonered a little at the ominous appearance of hings. But Monday's visit brought him the rst certain information of what it all porended. The arrival of the three men dressed a their Sunday clothes, and each one decoratd with a long face, he knew meant somehing, and as he had just finished the charing of his coal for the day and it lay moking in a neat heap where he had raked up and sprinkled it with water from the ack-tub, he was as ready to see them as e was apt to be in the next five days. His reeting was warm and brotherly, theirs, tiff and awkward.

Squire Lee, who was the last of the three o shake his hand, squirmed a little under ob's unconsciously severe pressure, and hen informed him that they wanted to see im a little while in the house. In the ouse, because what they had to say was ot for others to hear. Norris guessed orrectly that the sectarian devil had rought them to him; and as he seated hem in the airy side-room which served s library, drawing-room and parlor, he eated himself near the stand on which he well-read Testament lay. The waiting vas embarrassing to all the company; but he squire, after a season of fumbling in is vest pocket as if looking for a toothpick, made a beginning:

"Brother Norris, we are a committee from the church meetin' of last Saturday, appointed to expostulate and pray with you over your doctrinal views. Your notion of quoting Acts 2:38 is not in harmony with Baptis' doctorn, and we are instructed to remonstrate against it."

Norris answered slowly, and with feeling: 'I trust your instructions are not to remonstrate against Acts 2:38! Who is the author of that verse?"

The inquisitor colored a little, but went forward in his line of duty: "Oh! of course, we all know this passage comes from God, like the rest of the Bible. But our objection is to the using of it as an answer to sinners who ask what hey must do to be

"But, brethren," said the guilty man, "that ia all the use there is for it. It was given by Peter in answer to that question, and Peter surely did not answer incorrectly, he was just now 'endued from on high,' as the Savior promised before his death, and all the world agrees that he spake the message of the Holy Spirit. Don't you think such authority will do? If right to use that language then, is it wrong to use it now?"

"Perhaps not, if it can be made to represent Peter's true idea," said the squire.
"But we prefer to use other passages, so's not to favor water salvation."

"And is the idea of water salvation in this passage? Maybe Peter believed in water salvation? If so, just now, while the Holy Spirit is telling him every word he uses, maybe there is something in it. Come to think of it, Peter did later use language that sounds the same way. It was he in speaking of the salvation of Noah by the buoyancy of the ark as borne up by the water, who said, "the like figure whereunto baptism doth also now save us."

"Well, Brother Norris, we have no objections to the use of this passage, if at the same time you make plain the fact that one's sins are forgiven before he is baptized."

"But, brother, how am I to do that, when the idea is not in the passage? The language is 'be baptized for the remission of sins.' That does not sound as if the sins had already been remitted!"

The Squire looked helplessly around at Joe Revell, who was much better informed than himself. Joe had attended a debate at Owenton, where this matter had been much discussed, and he remembered the turn there taken. The champion had said, "All the dictionaries" give as a meaning of the word for, "because of," and from that they reasoned that sinners were not baptized at all, but the regenerated were baptized because their sins had been remitted. Looking exactly as if he did not believe it himself, he offered this as an explanation. But Job quickly replied: "And were they to repent because their sins were remitted?" Seeing three faces blushing with confusion, Norris thought the battle was over; and he only added a passage from Matthew (the 26th ◄ erse of chapter 28): "For this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Innocently going on, Job asked, "Was this blood of atonement shed because the sins of the 'many' had been remitted?"

The committee was now so "exquisitely perplexed" that they made no more effort to answer. The young preacher, who had listened with much interest, but had said nothing up to this point, now proposed the only feasible solution of the difficulty. Facing the accused, he said, with the assurance of young America: "Brother Norris, it is not a question to be debated. We all know you are sincere and uncommonly well informed; and we want your services and your influence in the church; but it is a serious matter to be arrayed against the usages of the church." As these very words were used by Rev. Henry in yesterday's sermon, Job now saw that the sermon had been aimed for him and he was better able to divine the animus of the whole proceeding. For a moment he felt a righteous disgust and indignation, but his sweetness of spirit immediately returned, and he listened with respect while the fluent Henry spoke: "Is it, then, your intention to continue a custom you know to be contrary to Baptist usage?"

Again the accused spoke, with deliberation and much feeling: "I cannot, brethren, be disloyal to the Holy Spirit for the sake of loyalty to the Baptist Church!"

Here the Squire found utterance again, and with a manner that said, "I've got him now where I want him," he spoke up: "Well, brethren of the committee, we've only one course. We can only take our leave and pray that God will direct our brother out of the way of error. Brother Henry, dismiss us with prayer."

The prayer was not denunciatory in tone, but the young man voiced the real wish of his heart, when, speaking to the Lord of faithfulness to the church, he begged to be "led to the higher paths of loyalty to God." Job was the only one of the three listeners who spoke an audible Amen!

It was almost a month before the next church meeting, and there was much thinking done about the Bend. The two older men kept silence, even to the point of being snappish and curt when spoken to on the subject. Prof. Guthrie tried both of them, but nothing would they divulge. In the three meetings that intervened, the effect, though smacking of mystery, was quite visible. Some, they knew not why, dropped out of the two classes, but a larger number dropped in. There was no disguising of the popular sympathy and Job Norris had a host of friends to explain to each other that he had not done anything wrong.

Of course, his class work must not be disturbed, for that would call for an explanation. He did his best to teach as before, but the embarrassment wore on him and he heartily wished it over. By every course of reflection through which his thoughts passed, he reached the original conviction that he had done right and that God would approve his course.

As he answered many questions at the shop in harmony with what he had already said, the committee came to regard him as incorrigible and at the next church meeting he was excluded. But the action of the body was not unanimous. A very respectable minority believed, with the teacher and his wife, that the church was turning out the best of its members. The young preacher could not be still. He continued to discuss church loyalty until it appeared plain that he was trying to keep himself from believing he had committed a wrong. Clearly the effect was against him, and at last Brother Lee rebuked him in these pungent words:

"Why don't you let up on that subject? If you think you done right, let the matter rest. You've already got the church to talkin' and the first thing you know, they'll be wantin' another preacher."

This, from the man of all men the preacher thought he was defending, was, to the young man, a stinging blow, and the next Lord's day when through with his sermon, he surprised everybody by announcing his resignation.

The Two Parties Compared.

The Republican party is in its composition quite as clearly as in its politics the true successor of the Federalist and Whig parties. It bears to-day the stamp of Hamilton's purpose, of Marshall's constructive bent, of Clay's fertility in makeshifts, even more legibly than of Lincoln's profound insight into the popular mind, or of Stevens's Cromwellian thoroughness. . . Of the two historical types of American character, the New Englard Puritan and the Virginian, the former is by far the more prevalent among its members.

No wonder, therefore, that it always goes before the people with a list of its practical achievements. Its ordinary conventions are not unlike meetings of stockholders; its committees are like boards of directors. Here, one might say at almost any Republican gathering in the North, is American energy, American shrewdness, American business correctness, occupied with political work. These men will go at the matter directly, they will reconcile or compromise their differences, they will waste no time with meaningless oratory, they will certainly get something done. Then each of them will go about his business. Such is the impression an observer would have got at Philadelphia last June

At Kansas City in July, at Chicago four years ago, one would have seen a different sort of Americans going at their work in a different way. Here, one might have said, is the American idea still militant, the American character not yet smoothed out of its angularity by contact with the larger world. Here is no business association, but a debating society, and none of the most orderly at that. What was energy yonder is enthusiasm here, what was there compromise and agreement is here compromise and disagreement or a pitched battle for supremacy. Here is less forethought of to-morrow and more questioning of the coming age, less correctness and more simple honesty of purpose, less intelligence and more hospitality to great ideas, less work and more oratory. This is the political aspect not of America the materially successful, but of America still revolutionary, still trying out the world's ideals. . . . The men who at the beginning of the century distrusted the elder Adams would in Jackson's time have distrusted the younger, and the men who be lieved Jackson's charges against the Nationa Bank would in our day cry out against Wal Street and the "square mile" in London . . They would look favorably on the plan of choosing senators by popular vote and might even attempt to reconstruct the financial system of the world in accordance

The Republican party is no more military no more imperialistic, than the Federalists were, or the Whigs; but it is ready, as they were ready, to employ the fittest available instrument for whatever work actual conditions and things done seem obviously to demand, and it is loath, as they were loath to relinquish an unfinished task for fear of a remote disaster or for reverence of a vague generality. To use military force freely and to have no fear of it, was characteristic of Alexander Hamilton, who left the treasury and personally accompanied the army that put down the Whiskey Rebellion, and it is with the popular conception of money.

ust as characteristic of the Hamilton party lo-day, whose candidate for the vice-presilency and prospective heir to the presidency s equally at home planning a campaign of laval strategy and leading a regiment into attle. That party is never lacking in the tatesmanship of the winds and the tides; hat of the compass and the stars is more apt o be Democratic.

So far as Bryanism is a definite program, t is contrary to many Democratic precedents: t antagonizes many interests which have ooked to the Democratic party for defense. But so far as it is a popular movement, so ar as it is a matter of impulse, so far as it effects character, it does not essentially iffer from any confessedly Democratic upising of the past. To cry out against iniuities, whether of wealth or of power, and o try, by some such device as an income ax or cheap money, to shift the burden on o the shoulders of the rich: to look with uspicion upon that department of governnent, the judiciary, which is least responive to popular moods; to entertain wild deas about public finance, which of all govrnment work is the hardest to make plain o the popular comprehension—these are all enuinely Democratic impulses. They may e all dangerous, all unwise as policies, but hey are all Jeffersonian and Jacksonian: hey are all manifestations of the same spirit hat won us our independence as a comnunity and our large freedom as individuals. -William G. Brown in November Atlantic.

The Young Lawyer's Call to Law.

The opening feature of the Saturday Evenng Post for October 27 is a brilliant paper y United States Senator Albert J. Beveridge n The Young Lawyer and His Beginnings. The following is an extract from the article:

"It used to be a part of the creed of a cerain denomination that a man should not be dmitted to the ministry who had not reeived his 'call.' It was necessary that he hould hear the Voice speaking with his ongue, and saying: 'Woe is unto me, if I breach not the Gospel.'

"This is true of the profession of law. So, t the beginning of your beginnings, do not begin at all unless you see a certainty of nisery if you do not. Unless you are convinced that you would rather work, toil, hay, slave for years to secure recognition in the law, than to be honored and enriched in some other occupation, do not enter this prolession of supreme ardor.

"If possible, get a thorough college education before you touch a law book. If you can get a college education, do not 'read law' while you are at college. If you go to colege, do not take what is known as the scientific' course or 'physical' course. Take the classical course. Next to geometry and logarithms and the Bible, the best discipline preparatory to making you a lawyer is the translation of Latin. It is the most logical anguage the world has ever seen, or is likely ever to see.'

Slaves to Bric.a-Brac.

"There are no people on the face of the earth who litter up the rooms of their homes with so much useless, and consequently bad furnishing as do the Americans," writes Edward Bok in the November Ladies' Home Journal. "The curse of the American home to day is useless bric-a brac. A room in which we feel that we can freely breathe is so rare that we are instinctively surprised when we see one. It is the exception, rather than the rule, that we find a restful room. As a matter of fact, to this common error of over-furnishing so many of our homes, are directly due many of the nervous breakdowns of our women. The average American woman is a perfect slave to the useless rubbish which she has in her rooms. This rubbish, of a costly nature where plenty exists, and of a cheap and tawdry character in homes of moderate incomes, is making housekeeping a nerve-racking burden. A serious phase of this furnishing is that hundreds of women believe these jimcracks ornament their rooms. They refuse to believe that useless ornamentation always disfigures and never ornaments. Simplicity is the only thing that ornaments. It does more: it dignifies. The most artistic rooms are made not by what is in them, but by what has been left out of them. One can never quarrel with simplicity, and nothing goes to make for perfect good taste so surely as a simple effect. A tasteful effect is generally reached by what has been left undone. And that is the lesson most needed in America to-day: not what we can put into a room, but what we can leave out of it."

THE TEN LEPERS CLEANSED.*

It is very doubtful if the present lesson belongs chronologically where we find it. Luke says that "It came to pass, as they were on the way to Jerusalem, that he was passing through the midst of Samaria and Galilee." The latest journey through these provinces of which we have any other account was made some months earlier than this, and the best authorities on the life of Christ place this incident during the journey made by the Master which is recorded in the closing part of the ninth chapter of Luke. It is there stated that "He stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusa lem." It will be remembered that the Samaritans refused him lodging in their homes, and the inference is that he turned aside, and followed the border line between Galilee and Samarla, until he entered the district of Perea, east of the Jordan. When we understand that the expression, "He was passing through the midst of Samaria and Galilee," can be rendered with equal accuracy, "between Samaria and Galilee," I think it is not unreasonable to place this incident during that journey. While its date is not very important, yet it seems so plainly out of its proper order here and fits in so perfectly with the above portion of the narrative, that I venture to believe that Luke did not follow the natural order here, but inserted this beautiful incident as it occurred to his memory, because he had overlooked it in its proper place.

Jesus and his disciples were approaching a village, on the border of these two provinces, when, just outside the gate, they met a group of those wretched beings whose afflictions are productive of pity and horror in the hearts of beholders. Leprosy is so foul a disease, its manifestations so repulsive, that men shrink from its victims, even though they be nearest neighbors and kinsfolk. It was a constant marvel that Jesus did not draw back from their approach, and that he even touched their ulcered bodies with his hand They were not suffered to enter the cities, and on the approach of wayfarers, they must put their hands over their mouths and cry "unclean, unclean." Another fact is stated, and a strange one, namely, that at least one of these lepers was a Samaritan. "Misery makes strange bedfellows." Jew and Samaritan, hating each other with the intensest hate, are here drawn together by a common affliction. On the border of their respective countries, "like froth at the margin of wave and sand," the wretched of both Galilee and Samaria gathered, and forgot their animosity in their common misery. Suffering is often the only means by which man will learn human brotherhood

The fame of Jesus' healing ministry had reached these poor wretches, and they may have talked together of the possibility of finding relief through his gracious power. No sooner did they see him than, still keeping at a distance from him, they cried aloud, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us!" The answer was immediate. He called out to them, "Go and shew yourselves unto the priests." They understood what he meant, and forthwith turned their faces toward their temples, the Jews setting out for Jerusalem, and the Samaritan for Gerizim. The law for the cleansing of the leper was set forth minutely in Leviticus, 13th and 14th chapters. There were certain tests by which the priest was to determine whether a disease were leprosy or not. If proven to be such, the leper must be shut out from the camp. No means were given for his treatment, for it was believed to be beyond human remedy. Yet, in some cases, the leper recovered, and then he was to submit to certain o her tests, until the priest declared him cured, and gave him a certificate to that effect. After making the prescribed offerings, and bathing himself, with some additional rites of purification, he was again at liberty to resume his former life of perfect freedom. We may imagine with what eagerness one of these poor creatures, so long shut out from home, and all human companionship save that of his fellow sufferers. would hasten to the priest to secure his certificate of cleansing.

But what faith these lepers manifested. For they were not yet healed when they started to show themselves to the priests. Had their confidence in Jesus been faint, they would have said, "What is the use of going to the priest? We are not vet cured, and he will give us no certificate while the leprosy is yet upon us." They somehow felt that Jesus had answered their petition and that they were to receive the blessed boon of health. So off they hastened, and had hardly started till they felt the current of life flowing freely through their veins, and looking upon their flash, just now raw and loathsome, found it fresh and clean again. What folly it is to hesitate when the Savior bids us do anything upon which depends the reception of his grace. Had these poor lepers refused to trust him, and demanded some visible assurance of their healing before taking a step in the way of obedience, how infinite their loss. Do not men so treat the Master to-day? When he bids the sinner to believe in him and be baptized, in order to the forgiveness of his sins, how often the stubborn soul answers, "What 's the use of being baptized? How can water wash away sins? Why can't the Lord forgive me without that formality?" And he goes away un aved, because he has not faith in Jesus to lead him to obey. Another, hearing the same message, cheerfully obeys, and in the very process of obedience finds his heart rejoicing in the Lord, and feels that his sins, which are many, are all forgiven. He cares not whether they were pardoned before, or during, or after baptism. They are washed away, and that is all he cares to know. And he has ob yed the Lord, and that fills his soul with peace and sweet assurance

All the ten lepers were glad when they found their leprosy gone. But one was grateful. Nine were so eager to get their certificate of cleanness from the priest that they forgot their benefactor. One heart overflowed with love, and could not wait for the formalities of the law to be complied with, before expressing its grateful affection. The Samaritan turned back and threw himself down on his face at Jesus' feet, and poured out his thanks. The soul of Jesus was pained at this new evidence "Were of the ingratitude of his own people.

there not ten cleansed? But where are the nine Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?" Ah! how many times is the divine heart grieved with human ingratitude. How many in our own Christian land hear unmoved the message of the gospel, and live and die in disobedience; while heathen men and women eagerly drink of the meager drops of Christian truth that are taken them by the missionary. How many, in Christian homes, enjoy the benefits of our holy religion without appreciation or rendering of thanks. How many families feed upon God's bounty daily, with never a word to show that they recognize the hand of God in their prosperity. We need a revival of the grace of gratitude. We need to learn to say "Ihank you" to those who do us favors, and above all to daily praise God for his wonderful mercy to us and our dear ones. This poor Samaritan had gotter from Jesus' grace a ri ber gift than any of his companions, because his faith was purer and deep er. Jesus could well say to him, "Thy faith hath made thee whole." And we doubt not, with these words, there entered into his soul the sweet as urance of his forgiveness, that made even his healing from the dread disease of leprosy seem meager gift.

$100 Reward, $100.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have on much faith in its curative powers, that they offer one Hundred Dollars for any case that it falls to cure. Send for list of Testimonials. Address,

*Lesson for November 18. Luke 17:11-19.

Christian Endeavor.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

TOPIC FOR NOVEMBER 18.

WHAT INTEMPERANCE COSTS OUR NATION.

Prov. 23:1-7; 15-21.

[Quarterly Temperance Meeting.]

Intemperance annually costs our nation many homes. Families are by it by ken up. Sons and laughters, fathers and mothers, are turned out of comfortable houses and made to toil hard or starve. Wives that have known plenty are pinched with want and struggle to feed their little ones. Children that have known the advantages of school life are turned into the shop and the factory, the streets, the docks, and the farms, to that nost degrading of all conditions, child labor.

Intemperance also costs health. Excess of any kind strikes at the centres of strength. Nerve and brain pay the penalty of misuse, just as a delicate machine shows the rack and ruin of overburdening. And worst of all, it is not merely the health of the inebriate that suffers, but also that of his innocent family which must suffer for his wrongdoing. How far the mystery of heredity applies is cause for question; but undoubtedly, those already born suffer hunger, cold, neglect, iwafing and degradation. The sins of the one are upon the others' heads.

Intemperance costs happiness to scores and housands every year. What joy is there in living na house with a brute? If one should be compelled by the law of the land to keep his beast of burden in the parlor, it would destroy, would it not, all contentment in that home? Besides, an inebriate is, himself, far from happy. He is harassed always by the consciousness of his weakness and by the physical discomfort of his condition.

Intemperance costs lives. Is it to be wondered at, after the catalogue of miseries to which inebriacy reduces the victims and their friends, that many succumb to the burdens and prematurely die? Delirium tremens takes some; other diseases sweep away others; suicide claims many, and general worthlessness, open to the attacks of any and all sorts, slays more.

For all in all this is a good year to vote against liquor. Not many people are satisfied with the candidates of either of the two great political parties. Many a man is declaring that he must vote, in spite of certain objections both to candidates and platforms. The prohibition candidate is an able man. Wide-awake people are predicting a larger vote for prohibition this year than it has ever polled before. If it can once wield the balance of power, it would be well with the country. This is written and will probably be published before the election.

Buffalo, N. Y.

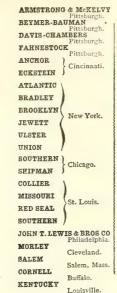

The congregation here last Lord's day employed Bro. B. F. Daly to its pastorate for next year. This was without a dissenting voice.

At the same time the undersigned was called to the eldership, The co-elders are Brethren Mitchell, Hinchman, Dr. King and Major Branham.

The church rally was well attended a week preceding the above date. I was, at the time, absent at Fairland, preaching a memorial sermon. The church was organized by me and my brother, J. Carey Smith, now of Emo, Ont.

On the fourth Sunday in November I am to pleach at Nameless Creek, a country church in this county. E. S. Conner is to hold a two weeks' meeting there following the election.

Book Notes.

The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901 stands at the head of all helps for Sunday-school officers, teachers and advanced pupils. For many years this annual commentary has been the favorite of the vast majority of our leading Sundayschool workers. The volume for 1901 is better than ever before. W. W. Dowling never did better work than he has put into the International Lessons for next year. The Commentary is a handsome volume of 429 pages. Besides the practical notes and comments on the lessons for the year, it contains chronological tables of the Life of Christ and the Old Testament, a Complete Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names with their pronunciation and meaning, and One Hundred and Sixty-eight pictures, maps, diagrams, blackboard designs etc.

The price of the Christian Lesson Commentary is One Dollar for single copy, postpaid, or $9.00 per dozen copies, not prepaid. There are some commentaries that are sold for a few cents less than this, but, setting aside other points of superiority, it should be remembered that the CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY is handsomely and substantially bound. It is a book that will be in constant use throughout the year, and we believe our patrons prefer to pay a few cents more for a book that will last the entire year and then be in condition to be preserved as a reference book for the fgture, than to save a few cents by purchasing a book so cheaply bound that it will come to pieces before the year is half gone.

We much regret that some of our patrons neglected ordering the "Home Library" and the "Biographical and Historical Library" until it was too late, despite the ample warnings given that our offers would be withdrawn October 31. We trest that all who desire to secure the "Excelsion Library" will send their orders promptly. This splendid set of books, which will be sold during November and December, contains Twelve Volumes, as follows:

Dr. Carl Brown. Edna Carlisle. Paul Darst. Rosa Emerson. Shem. Riverside.

Up Hill. Nehushtan. Queen Esther Across the Gulf.

Hugh Carlin. Mary Ardmore.

All for Five Dollars! Let us just bint to Sunday-school teachers who desire to make Christmas gifts to their scholars, that they will do well to purchase the "Excelsior Library" and distribute the books among the young people. These books will be appreciated by persons between the ages of fourteen and ninety-five!

ELIJAH, the new book by M. M. Davis, is a worthy companion book to his former volume, "Queen Esther," which was received with such favor. It is the story of the life, times and work of the great prophet, and the lessons to be learned from his career. Like "Queen Esther," this book is invaluable to all earnest students of the Bible. It should be read and absorbed by preachers, Sundayschool teachers and Endeavorers. It is a neat volume of 201 pages. Price, 75 cents.

We are much gratified at the demand for copies of our new General Catalogue, and at the many complimentary letters we are receiving concerning it. This catalogue is a handsome book of 100 pages, printed on fine paper and profusely illustrated with pictures of men and of books. We will be glad to place a copy-free-in every Christian home. All that is necessary is for you to drop us a postal card, asking that a copy be sent you. We will do the rest.

Let it be remembered that the "Campbell Library," comprising the complete works of Alexander Campbell, is still offered. No time limit was placed on this set of books, as it is intended to be permanently offered. This set, it will be remembered, includes the following:

Christian System. Popular Lectures and Living Oracles. Addresses.

Lectures on the Pentateuch. Christian Baptist. Evidences of Christi- Sermon on the Law.

anity. Christian Baptism. Campbell Purcell Debate. Letters to a Skeptic. Life and Death.

Each of these works is described at length in our new General Catalogue. Our price for the set, prepaid, is Eight Dollars.

This is the season of the year when many churches and Sunday-schools purchase new song books. Before ordering books, you should not forget to carefully examine the Gospel Call, Silver and Gold, and Tidings of Salvation. These are all splendid books, whose merit has been attested by their rapid sale and circulation. Although they are sold much cheaper than many other books of less merit, our first thought in preparing them was not-How cheap a book can we produce? Our thought was rather, How good a book can we prepare? Afterward we considered the matter of price. Write us for specimen pages and price list of these books.

BIGGS.

Tuesday evening, Oct. 17, 1900, one of our old-st members. Sister Mariah A. Biggs, passed eacefully away from earth. By reason of strength he had passed fourscore years. As a mother she was dutiful and loving; as a friend, faithful and generous almost to a fault. Universally loved where known, her death will leave a void in the hearts of her friends which none other can fill. That her spirit may find surcease from sorrow and a happier and sublimer life with its Maker, is the earnest prayer of those who mourn her dead today.

KELSO.

Good Sister Kelso died in Callaway County, Mo., Oct. 21, 1900. She was born in Bedford County, Va., Sept. 20, 1838. Came to Missouri when a girl. Her maiden name was Lucy E. Barker. She was converted and joined the church in early life and was a member of the congregation in Kirksville for several years. Sister Kelso's life was one of great usefulness. For several years she was state organizer of the C. W. B. M. of Missouri. Her character was a beautiful one. Those who knew her loved her. The church and the world are both richer because she lived in it. Her funeral was preached by the writer. Ged bless her bereaved husband and children and many friends.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the sys-

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and odorous vegeta-

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the testh and further acts as a natural and emmently safe cathartic

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and toroat from the poison of cararrn

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozen-ges, the charcoal being mixed with honey. The daily use of the selection will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great hereft great benefit great benefit.

A Buffal physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "Tadvise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patien's suffering from gas in the stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, nouth and throat; I also believe then liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; trey cost but twenty-five cents a bix at drog stores, and although in some sense a patent proparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordidary charcoal tablets."

A Fifty Thousand Dollar Painting

The Balloon

By Julien Dupre

JULIEN DUPRE, one of the foremost artists of the time, is a Frenchman and a Parisian. He is now at the height of his power, in his forty-eighth year of age. M. DUPRE has been honored with medals in the Salon on several occasions, and such of his work as "The Gleaners," "In The Pasture" and "The Escaped Cow" have excited the greatest admiration among the general public, and also among the connoisseurs. His most remarkable work is called "The Balloon," and is a canvas which would have made him formers had be retained after the leaders of the French school of work is called "The Balloon," and is a canvas which would have made him famous had he not already stood among the leaders of the French school of artists. The subject treats of a group of peasants in the harvest-field. The peasants have spent the morning raking and stacking hay, the sun is at its zenith, not a breath of air is stirring, you can almost hear the bees as they buzz from flower to flower, and away off in the distance is seen a balloon floating majestically in the clear, blue sky. Evidently the villagers are holding their country fair, and a balloon ascension is one of the features. The group, consisting of the peasant and his family, are in the picturesque costume of the country. They have all stopped work, and stand with their rakes in their hands gazing intently at the distant balloon. Wonder, awe, and admiration are blended in their expressive faces and revealed in their attitudes. The subject has been treated with those soft, mellow tints which its artist knows so well how to paint, and recalls to the mind of many just such incidents in our childhood life. It is justly popular, both on account of its artistic quality and the deep human interest with which it has been clothed. The original is now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, and is valued at $50,000.

G. Grosvenor Dawe, manager circulation; Cosmopolitan. "The idea is admirable; and the execution of the idea beyond all criticism."

E. D. Lyon, superintendent public schools, Mansfield, O. "The ARTOGRAVURE of The Balloon sent me is indeed a beautiful picture, and I appreciate it highly."

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. For, whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. This being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? "Think on these things."

A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume.

"Shem" is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylouian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the telation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CTS.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The best thing about the political cambaign which has just closed is that it was a lean campaign. The presidential candiates were both Christian gentlemen and vere recognized as such by their opponents. here was probably never a political conest in the history of this country that was nore conspicuously devoid of offensive peronalities. In two cases, the results of the lection have been a rebuke to political rookedness-in St. Louis and in New York lity. There is probably no more corrupt et of local officials in this country than the Republican City Hall gang in St. Louis. hey are as bad as they know how to be. If hey had more ability, they would be worse. uch was the indignation of all decent citiens that the normal Republican majorty was wiped out and the entire list of emocratic candidates for local offices was lected. This may not have been a very atelligent sort of vengeance, for the offices which were being filled at this election were ot the City Hall offices. But this distincon was too fine for the average citizen to nake and the votes registered a storm of rotest against the "moon yet" administraion in St. Louis. How much the operation f the Nesbit election law (a fit companion iece to the Goebel law) contributed to the esult, cannot be known-probably a good And the Nesbit law, assisted by he police force (under corrupt Republican hanagement) elected one Democratic conressman from St. Louis whom Congress night well eject from its halls to avoid noral contagion. Truly there is no politics a St. Louis; it is merely the decent against he indecent. In New York City the notoiously nefarious political methods of Mr. roker resulted in a reduction of the pluality from the 80,000 which he claimed to he 30,000 which he got. Still, the revulion was not strong enough to overthrow is power, though it narrowed his margin.

Fortunately for the nerves of the public, his was not one of those close elections where the result remains long in doubt. Iven in the doubtful states the returns ame in promptly. Nebraska's electoral ote, which was at first believed to be democratic, was found to be Republican by fair margin. The ante-election claims of the chairmen of the national committees are interesting reading in the light of the esults. Two days before the election the denocratic chairman gave out this statement: "The fight is won. Bryan and tevenson will be elected. The Democrats will hold all states carried in 1896, with the possible exception of Wyoming. We will also carry New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Marylan I, West Virginia, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio and Illinois." The fact that of these nine states his party carried none but Kentucky (and even that would have been doubtful but for the assistance of the Goebel law) does not speak well for Mr. Jones' ability as a political guesser. Yet he was right in saying that "in a general way there will be somewhat of a falling off of Bryan's strength west of the Mississippi and that east of the Mississippi he will make overwhelming g sins"-except that the gains were not overwhelming. The forecast of the New York Herald, which gave McKinley 282 electoral votes, maintained its former reputation for accuracy. Its only substantial error was in assigning Nebraska to Bryan. The last estimate of the Republican national chairman claimed 294 votes for McKinley; the actual returns gave him 292. The difference is accounted for by the unfulfilled expectation of getting Kentu ky's 13 and by the acquisition of 8 from Nebraska and 3 from Utah, which had not been claimed.

The comments of the press upon the results of the election are naturally as diverse as the political opinions of the papers. All, however, seem agreed that the material prosperity of the country will not suffer by reason of the continuance of Mr. McKinley in office. The St. Louis Republic (Dem.) in its editorial on the morning after election says that "the outlook for prosperity is bright" and that the thing for the people to do is to quit talking politics and go to work. There is pretty general agreement, too, as to the cause of the Democratic defeat. Antiimperialism won votes in the East but lost them in the West, and the gains were not enough to compensate for the losses. Even such a paper as the New York Journal (Dem.), which stands for both free silver and antiexpansion, refers to these two doctrines as "extraneous issues, needlessly dragged into the campaign" and contributing to its defeat. Whether or not one approves of the administration's Philippine policy, it is not difficult to see the necessary truth of the comment of the Philadelphia Press (Rep.), that "no party which has condemned a successful war has failed to go into involuntary retirement." "The election," says the Press, "puts the seal of strong disapproval on Bryanism and says to President McKinley, Well done, thou faithful servant. Bryan would have been beaten anyhow, even if the corpse of free silver had not dangled at his neck." The New York Evening Post (Indep. anti-expansionist) says that "general trade will be very favorably affected by the defeat of Mr. Bryan," and maintains that the prosperity a gument was the only one that really counted in the campaign. "It will be impossible to find in the election returns any gauge of public sentiment as to issues. As a choice between the only change possible—the transfer of the government to Mr. Bryan and his mixed following—and a second McKinley administration, the country prefers the latter. Prosperity won on the old maxim, 'Let well enough alone.'"

The responsibility which now rests upon the Republican party, having control of both branches of Congress for another four years as well as the executive, is very great. Since 1874, the year which witnessed the first Republican landslide after the war, the Republican party has never had control of the House of Representatives twice in succession until 1896 1900. A good working majority in power for eight years ought to be able to accomplish a good deal if it is worthy of its trust. The leaders are already mapping out the legislation for the next session of Congress which assembles December 3. The Ways and Means Committee will meet before Congress convenes to prepare a bill for the modification of the present war revenue law. Secretary Gage and his assistants are now preparing the information which they were called upon to give as to the needed revenues and the possible reduction of taxation. There may be important legislation in relation to insular affairs, depending chiefly upon how Perto Rico and Hawaii conduct themselves and what the Cuban constitutional convention does. The reapportionment of representation on the basis of the new census will call for c nsideration. It is desired to keep the House of Representatives at about its present size, 357 members. To do this the ratio of represen ation will have to be changed somewhat, giving one representative to about 209,000 of population instead of 173 901 as at present. The matter of decreasing the representation of those southern states which have disfranchised a large proportion of their negro citizens, will also have to be taken up. There will be a hard fight in regard to the increase of the army and navy. General Miles still holds to his estimate that there should be one regular soldier for every thousand of population. This would make a standing army of 80,000. Senator Proctor, a prominent member of the Senate Committee on military affairs, favors a regular army of 55,000 with a provision that the President may at his discretion increase it to 100,000. Other important legislation at the coming session will deal with naval increase, appropriation for river and harbor improvement and the building of public buildings, and the ship subsidy bill.

The Lord Mayor's Banquet at London was held on Friday of last week and the Prime Minister, as usual, made his annual Guild Hall speech, giving a comprehensive and official summary of the current happenings of prime importance. Lord Salisbury found in his prospective retirement from the foreign secretaryship an excuse for speaking somewhat more freely of some things than might be expected of one in so high an office. In regard to our election he said: "We believe that the cause which has won is the cause of civilization and commercial honor. We believe those principles to be at the root of all prosperity and all propress in the world. Therefore we claim that we ha e as much right to rejoice in what has taken place as the distinguished gentleman (Ambassador Choate) who sits at my side." Except for this burst of enthusiasm, the Guild Hall speech was pervaded by a melancholy tone. The cost of the war was dwelt upon and the price of the victory received more emphasis than the victory itself. The dangerous illness of Lord Roberts' daughter was feelingly alluded to. The War Office was praised for the way in which it has handl-d affairs, but, referring to the alleged incompetency of the department, Lord Salisbury said: "I should rather deprecate any unnecessary examination into what has occurred." The present condition of international affairs holds out little promise, he says, of the realization of the dream of disarmament and universal peace. The dilatory proceedings of the allied Powers in China were referred to in a tone bordering on ridicule.

Mr. Root, Secretary of War, is making a trip in Cuba. There was an effort at first to convince the public that it was a mere vacation journey for his health, but it has now become apparent that his visit has political significance in connection with the Cuban constitutional convention, which is now in session, though it is not known what he will try to do. Doubtless he will at least gather some information which will be useful to the President in the preparation of his forthcoming message to Congress. The constitutional convention has been very slow in getting into action, but this deliberateness in a people naturally so inclined to be hasty is by no means an unpromising symptom. While all political parties in Cuba are represented in the Convention, the radical revolutionary or war party has a strong majority. The leaders of this party are the men who are least likely to welcome any attempt on the part of our government to guide them either in the formulation of a constitution or in the administration of affairs. The control of the customs is a point about which they are particularly sensitive. They do not feel that they possess a real government of their own unless they have complete charge of its income. It will, however, probably be deemed necessary for our government to continue in charge of the Cuban customs for a time at least. There is at present a strong current of immigration to Cuba from Spain. Not less than 60 000 have come in the last ten months. At this rate it see ns not impossible that before many years Cuba may by peaceable vote return to Spanish methods of government, even if not to actual Spanish sovereignty unless constitutional barriers are erected. In view of this fact the work of the Constitutional Convention is particularly important.

After many delays the representatives of the Powers in China have agreed upon the terms to which China shall be required to submit as the basis of a preliminary treaty. The chief points are these: China shall build a monument to Baron von Ketteler on the spot where he was murdered and shall send an imperial prince to Germany to offer apology; eleven high officials, already specified, shall be put to death; all officials who in the future fail to prevent anti-foreign uprisings shall be degraded and punished; the Tsung Li Yamen shall be abolished and its powers given to a foreign minister; the Emperor shall be accessible as civilized monarchs are; the forts at Taku and other points along the Chi Li coast shall be destroyed and the importation of war material prohibited; permanent legation guards and garrisons to keep open the line of communication from Pekin to the sea shall be maintained; the Boxers shall be suppressed by imperial proclamation; and indemnity shall be paid to states, corporations and individuals. It is estimated that the war expenses of each of the six Powers which China will be required to pay will be not less than $100,000,000. The total indemnity will not be much under a billion dollars. This is an enormous sum for China to pay, but, after all, there is nothing impossible about it, if the administration has reformed so that a decent degree of honesty can prevail in the collection of the taxes. The Chinese have always been opposed to the idea of being in debt, especially to foreigners, and while the Chinese Empire contains ten times as many people as Great Britain, its public debt is scarcely one-tenth as great. Li Hung Chang, however, maintains that it will be impossible for China to pay any such sum and that if the Powers insist on a large indemnity, they will have to take it in the form of land.

The railroad invaded Palestine years ago and the toot of the locomotive resounds along the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem. And now a line of steamers across the Dead Sea has been established to connect the cities of Jerusalem and Kerak. Hitherto the commerce between these cities has been carried on over the sand-swept desert roads around the sea. The first boat, built in Hamburg, has already been put on the route and a second, equipped like the first with electric lights and all modern improvements, is being constructed. The denizens of the desert are naturally much perturbed by this innovation.

The death of Marcus Daly marks the end of one of the greatest political feuds in the history of this country. The quarrel between the two Montana copper kings, Daly and Clark, who was sent to the Senate from Montana last year and sent back ag in on account of proven bribery in his election, was one of the most picturesque and far-reaching enmities which have ever come to public attention. Beginning as friends, business partners and brothers in-law, their ami able relations were disturbed by a little row over a water right which Daly needed for his copper mines. Clark bought it and forced him to pay sixty times the price which he had refused to pay to its original owner. Both men rose to positions of great wealth and their wealth was employed to a large extent in fighting each other. The struggle between Butte and Anaconda for capitol of Montana was merely a phase of the Clark-Daly feud. All the poli ics of the state took its coloring from this personal emnity and state representatives and congressmen were elected not as Republicans or Democrats, but as Clark men or Daly men. The election of Clark as United States Senator was a great triumph until it was proved that the vote had been secured by bribery. The strongest argument in defense of Clark was that Daly had used as much money in corrupting the legislature to keep him out as he had used to get in. Mr. Daly's death increases the probability that Clark will be re-elected to the Senate without the necessity of such conspicuous bribery as will warrant an ejection by that body.

The Paris Exposition closed in a blaze of illumination on the evening of November 12. The Directors were urgently requested to continue it longer but the condition of the buildings rendered this inadvisable. Staff and stucco cannot maintain an appearance of expositional gaiety in the wet autumn and dreary winter of Paris. The Exposition, in spite of its slow start and the comparatively small attendance in the early months, is said to have been a great financial success. The total attendance was more than 50,000,-000 or twice that of the Exp sition of 1889. M. Hanotaux, former Minister of foreign affairs, treats of the financial side of the affair in an article headed "The Balance Sheet of the Exposition" in which he says: "France expended 200,000,000 or 300,000,-000 francs to erect the Exposition. She has recovered them easily in the increase of the treasury receipts, which, for this year alone is nearly 100,000,000 francs, in the surplus of Parisian octroi duties, in the monuments remaining to the state or the city and in the quays, bridges and improved transportation facilities bequeathed by the Exposition. Moreover, there has been a general improvement of the city which has contributed to ts brilliance and beauty."

SOME AFTER-ELECTION RE-

Another great political campaign is ended, and the people of the United States, with characteri tic respect for law and for the majesty of public opinion expressed by the ballot, have quietly acquieced in the result. One cannot help feeling, as he looks back over the campaign and notes the results, that there are some lessons applicable both to our political and our religious life that ought to be noted. We feel sure that we shall not be misunderstood by any of our readers in mentioning some of these lessons.

One of the most obvious of these lessons is that political corruption in any party is a source of popular weakness. This truth finds illustration on boh sides of the recen; contest for national supremacy. Republicans in Missouri, and especially in St. Louis, are wondering why the Republican majority of 15,000 in this city disappeared in the recent election. They are ascribing it to the Nesbit Law and the Police Board. No doubt this law, which is an imitation of the Goebel Law in Kentucky, has had its effect in decreasing the Republican vote, but a more obvious reason, as every unbiased citizen of this city must realize is the corrupt Republican ring of the city, with a weak and incompetent Republican mayor, who has allowed the city's business to be neglected, its resources to be squandered and its streets to remain unlighted and in a filthy condition. What right has any party to expect a triumph at the polls with such a record of incompetency and mal-administration of the city's affairs to condemn it in the eyes of all good citizens? Political defeat is exactly what might have been expected, and what ought to have been the result. This is the price which the Republican party of the city has had to pay for the corrupt city administration which it put into power. It would be well for it to learn this lesson and take it to heart.

Another illustration of the same truth is seen in the city of New York. The alliance of the Democratic party with Richard Croker and Tammany was a fatal blunder. It cut down the large Democratic majority in the city to a mere bagatelle and increased the R publican majority in the state outside of the city so that it easily overcame the small odds against it in the city. No wonder the young Democrats of the city, as soon as the returns were in, shouted, "Down with Crokerism," for they realized that he had been the cause of the defeat of their favorite political leader. It ought to become a political axiom in this country, that no party which allies itself with, and puts itself under the control of, any political "boss" whose methods are known to be infamous, and whose avowed aim is personal aggrandizement, can ever win a national or state election.

It is true that these cases of corruption in politics do not always meet with speedy justice, and the party that perpetrates them may succeed for the time, but sooner or later the day of reckoning comes and political defeat must be the result. The Democrats in St. Louis have nominated and elected a man whose character and whose husiness are not only corrupt, but corrupting in their influence on the young men of the city. He is a disgrace to the party and a disgrace to our city. It was a great political blunder on the part of the Democrats which they must in future atone for, It does not pay, viewed from the standpoint of mere party success, to make standard-bearers of men whose characters are notoriously bad, and whose influence on the community in which they live is baneful. When the political parties all come to realize this fact, we shall be saved the disgrace of sending such men to represent us in the Congress of the United States.

There is a lesson to be drawn by Christian people from the recent campaign which ought not to be overlooked. It was a remark of one who had a profound insight into nature, and who was a keen observer of what was going on in the world, that "the children of this world are wiser in their day than the children of light." In other words he was forced to recognize the fact that the men of this world, in their efforts to accomplish the ends which they had in view, adopted wiser methods, as a rule, than the religious people of his time adopted for the accomplishment of the purposes they had in view. We cannot fail to be impressed with the truth of this statement as we witness the comp'eteness of organization in both the great political parties of our time, the prodigious amount of strength they put into the work of the campaign and the wisdom which they displayed in adapting means to ends. They employed the ablest men as speakers, and these men went everywhere preaching the gospel of their respective party platforms, coming in direct touch with the people and making as plain to them as possible the nature of the pending issues. They supplemented this method of instruction with literature that literally rained down upon the people. Speeches, editorials, platforms, appeals to the voters, were put in chesp tract form and scattered broadcast among the people. The newspapers of the country entered heartily into the work and used their pages freely for their respective parties. These men spoke, wrote and acted as if the salvation of the country depended upon their efforts. They were able to command large sums of money from liberal contributors who were deeply interested in the results of the election.

When we compare all this with the ordinary methods of church work, and realize how much greater issues are at stake with those who are pleading for the extension of Christ's kingdom, we can but feel how inadequate our efforts are to the great ends which we have in view. Moreover, when these political parties found there were factions among themselves, they immediately sought to heal them in order that they might present a united front to their opponents. They realized the value of unity in order to victory. What could n t the Christians of this country accomplish if they would put aside their divisions and party spirit and work together with the zeal, the liberality and the practical wisdom which the political parties have displayed during [the recent campaign? If they do that for a corruptible crown, ought we not to do it for an incorruptible one?

Another reflection which forces itself upon us as we read the results of the election is how badly moral issues fare when they are tangle I up with party issues and o scured by party spirit. At this writing it is not known how many votes were cast against the saloon and the liquor traffic, but it is safe to say that they represent but a small part of the antisa oon sentiment of the country. This gives aid and confort to the enemy and leads them to treat with contempt the sentiment of the temperance element of the country. Is it not evident that some way must be found by which the real sentiment of the people on this question can be voiced independent of party lines and independent of party issues, if we are ever to make the liquor power tremble before the righteous indignation of those who realize the magnitude of this evil? Is it not an appropriate time for the leading temperance and anti-saloon workers, representing all the organized efforts against the liquor traffic, to come together in council to consider ways and means by which this holy warfare can be carried on more successfully in the future than in the past? The campaign against the imperialism of King Alcohol must not end with this presidential election, but must be carried forward until the people of this country are free from his tyrannous and demoralizing reign. How to carry on this warfare in the most successful way is the all-important question which now confronts the Christian and temperance people of this country.

Editor's Easy Chair

"To see clearly," says Ruskin, "is poetry, prophecy, and religion all in one." Aye, but who can "see clearly?" He of the pure heart, the honest mind and the unclouded brain. The vision of things divine is not so much a matter of intellect as of character. "To see the King in his beauty," says Frederick Robertson, "is vouchsafed not to science, not to talent, but only to Purity and Love." Education, however, united with a pure heart, does help to open up to us the beauty and glory of the natural world, and enables us to see the handiwork of God in the heavens above and to trace his foot prints on the earth beneath. So vast are the motives for purity of heart that it is a wonder men do not seek it, at all cost, as the pearl of great price. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

The time seems to us propitious for special evangelistic efforts among the churches. The election excitement is over, the crops are harvested, the evenings are long, the weather is favorable and the interest created by our National Convention is felt in many of the churches. It may not be practicable to secure an evangelist of renown, but this is not necessary in order to put the church to work to convert souls to Christ. Perhaps we have put too much dependence upon evangelists and too little on the Lord who is able to use the weak things of this world to confound the mighty. The best way to have a revival is to desire one, then pray for it, and then work for it. Perhaps your pastor can hold you the very best meeting, if you will pray for him, hold up his hands and work with him. Individual effort at soul-winning is what is needed in all our churches.

This is saying nothing, of course, against trained evangelists who have have had large experience in conducting evangelistic services, and whose labors have been abundantly blessed of God in lifting churches to a higher spiritual level, in cementing the ties between pastor and people, and in converting large numbers from the world. These men will be sure to find all they can do, and still there will be many calls they cannot answer. Our point is, that churches should not fail to put forth special efforts to reach the unconverted in their respective communities, because they cannot secure the aid of an able evangelist. Very humble talent, consecrated to God, often wins signal victories for His Cause. What is needed is more faith in the power of the gospel, in the efficacy of prayer, in personal effort and in hearty co-operation.

It ought to be remembered continually that the best preparation for evangelistic work in any church is first of all that the members put themselves right with God and with each other. No church is in a fit condition for turning men to the Lord until it has itself turned to him fully, and in His strength uncertakes the work of bringing others to Him. The failure to observe this condition is one of the most common sources of failure in evangelistic effort. In the later years of his life, especially, Mr. Moody felt that the chief obstacle in the way of converting sinners to Christ was the lukewarmness and worldliness of the churches. Hence an evangelist usually has to devote a few weeks to the conversion of the church before he is ready to begin on the wor'd. But this preliminary work should be done by the church itself, and when this is well done, it may turn out often that no outside help is necessary for a good meet-

One of the best signs of the readiness of a church to begin evangelistic efforts will be found in the prayer-meeting It, more than any other meeting, perhaps, registers the spiritual condition of the church. If its attendance be meager, if the singing be without spirit and life, and few are inclined to pray, and if the prayers are mechanical and the talks of the same type, the church is in no condition for a forward movement. But when the attendance is large and the spirit of earnestness and devotion is manifest in their songs, and prayers, and exhortations, when the hour seems too short for all who wish to participate, this may be taken as the sound of going in the tops of the mulberry trees, and the church may well expect and prepare for additions from the outside. Many of the best meetings among us have originated in the prayer-meeting. Even Pentecost was preceded by a prayer-meeting and this is apt to be the case in every great spiritual movement of the church.

THE CHURCH AT EPHESUS— A SCRIPTURE STUDY.

(REV. 2:1-7.)

(Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Nov. 27.

CENTRAL TRUTH: Jesus Christ, though risen and glorified, is still in the midst of his churches, noting their faith, their fidelity, their faults, and seeking to inspire trem to accomplish the work for which they were established.

This is a letter from Jesus Christ, sent through John to the church in Eph-sus. By "the angel of the church" is probably meant what we would call the pastor or overseer of the congregation. The risen Christ describes Himself as "he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, he that walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks." From the last verse in the preceding chapter, we learn that "the seven stars are the angels of the seven churches; and the seven candlesticks are seven churches." means, then, that Christ holds the ministers of the churches in His right hand, and walks amidst the churches themselves. In other words, He has special care of those who have special care of His churches, and he walks amid these churches in intimate communion and fellowship with them. He is not an absentee Christ. He is fulfilling His promise made to His disciples: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

There is great comfort in this assurance of our risen Lord, that He has not left His faithful congregation alone to battle with the powers of darkness, but that He is with them, leading them on to conflict and unto victory. Let this thought cheer our hearts when the battle seems to be hard, and when they that are against us seem to be more than they that are with us. If Christ be with us, who can be against us?

Sometimes we feel as if our toils and sacrifices were unappreciated by the world and even by our closest friends. But even if this were so, it matters little since there is One that knows all. "I know thy works, and thy toil and patience, and that thou canst not bear evil men, and didst try them which call themselves apostles, and they are not, and didst find them false; and thou hast patience and didat bear for my name's sake and hast not grown weary." All these things the Savior had carefully noted, and not one prayer had been offered, not one burden borne, not one pain endured for His name's sake, escaped His attention. Let this thought comfort us when we feel that we are not appreciated.

But in spite of these good points which our Lord first mentions, He now calls their attention to a grievous fault, namely, "That thou didst leave thy first love." That was something that went right to the heart of the Master. As long as the heart is as true to im as the needle to the pole, He can look with compassion upon our errors and shortcomings; but when the heart grows cold toward Him and ceases to thrill with that passionate love which we first experienced when we realized what he had done for us, it must bring pain to His own loving heart. How is it with us? Do we love Him as we once loved Him, when we first turned our backs upon the world, and said, come weal or woe, we will follow our Lord whithersoever He may lead us? This is a question which every heart must answer for itself.

There is but one remedy for this, as for every other fault, and that is, "Remember, therefore, from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I come to thee and will move thy candlestick cut of its place except thou repent." Stern words these, but they are none the less words of love. Repentance is the only remedy for the sin of heart-apostasy, and it is only by remembering all that we were, and all that Christ has done for us, that we are likely to be brought to repentance. The sermon, the songs, and especially the breaking of bread, are well calculated to make us remember and to bring us to repentance.

The tender-hearted Lord seems unwilling to close this letter, which began with commendation, without another word of approval, and so adds: "But this thou hast, that thou hatest the works of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate." It is a good thing to be sure that we hate what the Lord hates, as well as to love what He loves. A lover of right-eousness must also be a hater of iniquity, if he would be like his Master. We cannot be on good terms with sin if we are the friends of Christ. Many have tried this to their utter ruin.

The letter closes with that solemn admonition so often repeated in this book, and in the teaching of the Savior, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the churches." The churches of to day must hear these words of the Master, as well as the churches of any other period in the past, and hearing, it must heed if it would live.

And then, there is the promise that, "To him that overcometh to him will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God." Let it be noted that it is not to him that professes, or joins the church, but to him that overcometh, to him that antagonizes evil and conquers it, that resists temptation, refusing to yield to it, and that in the strength of his Master gains the victory over sin, to him is the promise made that he will be given "to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God." This means the enjoyment of the richness and fulness of life e ernal which Christ came to give to the world. May this be the reward of all who read this lesson!

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou hast not only called us by Thy gospel out of the world into fellowship with Thyself, in the great work of the world's redemption, but Thou art with us as a Comrade, as a Leader in this great conflict with the powers of evil.

We thank Thee for Thy words of reproof. We beseech Thee that Thou wilt never leave us nor forsake us but continue to encourage us with Thy presence and guide us with Thine eye. If at any time our hearts depart from thee may we hear Thy voice calling us to repentance, and may we turn and live. And grant at last, we beseech Thee, that in Thy strength we may overcome and be permt ed to satisfy the hunger of our hearts by partaking of the fruit of the tree of life and reign with Thee forever. And to Thy name we will ascribe everlasting praises. Amen!

Questions and Huswers.

A brother accused of sin against morality and decency and attempted sin against virtue is brought before a civil officer and pleads guilty of the charge and pays his fine. What is the proper method for the church to pursue? In the withdrawal of fellowship is it necessary to notify him to appear before the board, he having already plead guilty to the charge? Or in the case of such heinous sin should not the chruch withdraw fellowship and if he at any time desires to return let him come by the way of confession and reformation of life? I. G. Norance.

It would be advisable, we should think, for some of the offi ers of the church to visit this erring brother and ascertain if he is prepared to make confession of his error, ask the forgiveness of his brethren and renew his allegiance to the Lord and to His cause. If he should be found penitent, it would be wrong to ex lude him. Of course, in the absence of penitence for his wrongdoing, it would be the duty of the church to withdraw its fellowship from him with a view of ultimately bringing him to repentance and to a better life.

In a recent conversation which I had with two rather elderly people who were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, they related the following circumstance which happened during the late Civil war: Their local congregation ousted one of the good brethren from the synagogue on the charge of sympathizing w th the South, or, as they expressed it, "of entertaining treasonable sentiments." I objected and stated that I did not think the punishment of treason to be one of the legitimate prerogatives of the church, and that such conduct by her was childish, not to say contemptible. They thought it perfectly proper and seemed to be proud of the church's record for loyalty. They said the Methodist Church would as promptly purge herself of suspects of treason to-day as she formerly did.

I would like to know the merits of the question at issue.

We think our querist is right in his view of the question he presents. We know, as a matter of fact, that members of the same church, equally Christian in character, have differed entirely upon political questions, and even upon such fundamental questions of government as brought on our Civil war. It is greatly to the credit of our brethren throughout the country that they made these differences of opinion matters of forbearance, and no one, so far as we know, was ever excluded from a congregation in the north because of his sympathy with the south, nor from any congregation in the south for his sympathy with the north. This, we have no doubt, was the proper rule to observe then, and it is equally the proper rule to observe yet. It is not the province of the church to deal with political heresies, but only with such moral and religious heresies as render the life un-Christian.

- 1. In Acts 7:59, who was it who said: "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," Stephen or the mocking crowd?
- 2. What is the best Scripture with which to refute soul sleeping?
- 3. In reply to a querist, you say you hope there are not many who call this year a part of the twentieth century. Now, is not every year composed of 365 days and when these have rolled around, we say one year, and when one hundred of these cycles have rolled past we say one hundred years, and when nineteen hundred have rolled by we say nineteen hundred. Why, then, has not one year of the twentieth century passed with 1900?
 - 1. Stephen, of course.
- 2. Genesis 1:26 27, where a man is said to be created in the image of God; all passages referring to persons being raised from the dead; the transfiguration scene as recorded by the three evangelists, and the resurrection of Christ from the dead, and almost, indeed, all the New Testament.
- 3. Because nineteen hundred years have not "rolled by" until the end of the present year, just as the first year did not roll by until the end of that year.

Current Religious Chought

Most of us know that Mormon missionaries are at work all over this country and in Europe. Dowie's adventurous campaign in London is a matter of current history. There is a Mohammedan newspaper in New York and more or less of a propaganda behind it. Buddhism too, closely allied as it is to all the occultisms which form the favorite pabulum of the esoteric Bostonian m nd, is being pushed by a missionary movement in the western world. A recent brochure on Buddhism by a German savant gives much learned and accurate information. The following extracts were translated for the Literary Digest:

While the Christians of all leading denominations are sending their representatives with the gospel of Jesus Christ to the far East and are penetrating even the innermost recesses of the center of Asia, there comes from those regions a most unexpected answer in the shape of a Buddhistix counter-agitation an i mission. It is a work conducted with a zeal that deserves a better cause, and has adopted, as its means for conducting its propaganda, not the tongue of the preacher, but the print-r's art. One of the most repent and noteworthy examples of this new Buddhistix m'ssion literature is a tract which appears with the yellow color of the Buddhistic monks, and is entitled "Through Light to Light," and rather impolitely is addressed "to the Christian barbar ans of Europe." A perusal of this work shows that In all earnestness the attempt is made "to lead the barbarians and heathens of the West, who are still sunk in the lowest stages of religious ignorance"-to use the very words of the pamphlet—and bring them to see the light of the Buddhistic gospel.

An analysis of the Buddhistic creed brings to light the fact that practically it is not a positive religion at all, but that is highest aim is Nirvana, or annihilation, which is the only salvation to ffers in the great bacond. In this way, Buddhistic atheism and pessimism ends consistently in Nihilism. Its message may be sammed up in this one sentence: "The greatest of evils is life; the tighest of good is the nothing." The Buddhistic ideal of Nirvana is the absolute nothing, and this is the final consequence of the sys em. Its highest moral behest is, accordingly, to destroy the love of life and the tendency to self-preservation, and to avoid a reappearance in anot er and possibly worse form of creation by self-destruction and Nirvana. For this reason, Buidhism has devel oped a high type of monatic life, and these monks aim at realizing the ideals of the creed in a manner not possible to the latty. Poverty is one of the leading virtues among these monks, and celibacy is absolutely imperative. As beggars they travel through the country, and, as they do not work, their whole life is devoted to ascetic exercises and constant prayers, although there are no evidences of a systematic form of worship in their devotions. Their exercises consist chiefly in the repetitions of the sayings of Buddha, in disputations concerning his teachings, and in pious contemplation.

Over against these monks stand the bulk of Buddhists, consisting of those who have not the moral courage to become beggars; but these laymen are regarded only as half Buddhists, with poor prospects for the delights of Nirvana. Even for the laity the five rules hold good: (1) Kill no living creature; (2) do not take another's property; (3) do not touch another man's wife; (4) do not speak an untruth; (5) do not drink intoxicants. But the substance of the system is the doctrine that life is the greatest evil and that nothing is the greatest good; and its moral code is in harmony with these principles.

In classifying the six great religions in two groups, Max Muller called Christianity, Buddhism and Mohammedanism missionary religions, while Brahmanism, Zoroastrianism and Judaism are non-missionary. Speaking of the missionary activity of Mohammedanism, Oskar Mann says, in an article in the North American Review:

The status of Islam in America may be dismissed very briefly. On the whole continent of North and South America there live only about 49,500 Mohammedans, there being 20,500 in North and Central Ame ica. . At the present day the Balkan peninsula contains about 15,700 000 in abitants, of whom 3,350,000 are Mohammedans, most of them living in Turkish territory Ruf in Turkey itself a constant retrogression of Mohammalanism is to be observed. Here the religion of the Prophet encounters Chritianity, and frequently succumbs, since the latter is usually accompanied by the superiority of Western culture. On the other hand, great progress has been made by Mohamm-danism in this century in Asia and Africa, its ancient homes: less through the power of the sword than by means of untiring missionary work. It is a fact that, especially in Africa, this kind of peaceful progress is more often the result of a "jihad," or religious war; but, in spite of this, it must not be forgotten that the real instrument of Mohammedan propaganda is no longer the sword, as in the first centuries of Islamism, but the teaching of the priests who succeed the soldiers, and who impart the faith to the masses of the people. Almost the whole of the modern progressive movement of Mohammeda ism in this century may be traced, directly or indirectly, to a Puritanical sect, the so called Wahhabis. . . Like the Reformation of Lu her in Germany this movement was originally directed only against the abuse of the veneration of saints, against the abuse of the veneration of saints, against religious superstition and increasing luxury in worship, and, therefore, it aims merely at a spiri ual revival; it has, however, particularly since the destruction of its political importance, assisted a great deal in the exterior propaga ion of Mohammedanism. As little now could be effected by means of the sword for the renewal of the faith, so much the more fervently did its adherents labor as religious teachers within the sacred mosque itself.

THE CHRIST IN CONTRAST .- I.

W. J. LHAMON.

Within certain limits there are possibilities of comparison between the Christ and other great mas ers among men. Beyond these limits Christ himself forbids comparison by rising into the realm of marked and absolute contrast. Not a few ge erous students in the field of comparative religions have been so charmed with the process of comparison, and seemingly so engrossed with the common ethical and philosophical content of all religions, that they have failed to discover the supremacy that resides in the claims of Jesus and the uniqueness that marks his character and career. The times are calling for emphasis of that in the Savior of men which is unlike other men. Let Jesus be a man indeed, for he is that; let him be forever a Brother and a Friend; let him walk the earth with human feet, and let him have "a hand like my hand," or thine; let him be classed with Moses and Plato and Socrates and Buddha and Zoroaster and Confucius, or any greater list of highsounding names-but let us forget not to class him also with Peter the fisherman and Matthew the publican, and with James and John the sons of Zebedee, and with Lazarus of Bethany and Saul of Tarsus and Barnabas of Cyprus. In short, while we are indulging in the pedantry of selecting a list of great names to keep company with that of Jesus let us not forget that he himself classes himself with the whole race of us, and that seemingly if he had any preference it was for the humble ones among us rather than the "great, and mighty, and noble." Let his classification with humanity stand, for it is sweet and meaningful, and within the limits of that classification let there spring up every possible helpful comparison-not between himself and Plato or Buddha-but emphatically between him elf and ourselves, for there and no otherwhere is the field of comparison. All these great ones belong to our category. Plato is one of us, and not anything other than we in kind. And Buddha is one of us, however he may be wreathed in poetry and mythology; and Confucius is one of us, and Mohammed, and all the rest of our great ones. They are weak as men are weak, and sinful as men are sinful, and errant as men are errant, and they are strong, and wise, and noble, only according to the measure of men. We may look into their faces with great respect, but we may not worship them one whit more than the people we see in our mirrors. Where we are comparable with Christ so are they; and precisely where we strike the plane of contrast with Christ so do thev.

In syllogistic form the Christian position may be stated thus: Christ is unique, all others are but men; therefore their points of comparison and contrast with him are the same. In his presence we all level down alike. It is only when he steps aside and gives us the opportunity of indulging in the folly of comparing ourselves with ourselves that we begin to use the terms great and small.

This, then, is our hypothesis, and we have sought to make the statement of it quite explicit because of the tendency to stop with comparisons, or rather to carry comparisons forward into the realm where only contrasts can be. But there are other reasons for thrusting this great theme into prominence.

In the first place, the Christ of the dogmatic and speculative creeds is being so rapidly discredited that some are in danger of losing the real Christ. The big words that have been gathered round the name of Jesus, the attempt to limit him in terms of the illimitable, and to make him comprehensible to our finite minds in terms of the infinite, the contradictory and confusing categories of hoary councils,-all these fall with little meaning upon our modern ears. The theological schools may keep such relics as they will of post-apostolic and mediæval dogmatism, our busy, pushing, practical world wants to see the man himself. And somehow or other the man himself must be caused to loom larger in proportion as the theories about him fade from our vision. Well may our feeble stars pass out of sight if it is because the sun himself is approaching his rightful meridian among the sons of Again: Our world-embracing missionary enterprises can proceed logically not upon the basis of a Christ comparable with other masters, but only upon the basis of a Christ incomparable with and superior to all others among men. In the name of the peerless One, showing that he is peerless, we can go to the worshipers of Confucius and Buddha and Brahma claiming their attention and expecting their conversion. In the superiority of Jesus rests the warrant of his supremacy, and in his supremacy rests our warrant for the world-wide proclamation of his claims and the establishment of his church.

Once more: In proportion as it can be shown that Christ is incomparable there must come confirmation to the faith of his The fact of his superiority, followers. when once it is established, must stand as a challenge quite as effectually to our own age as to the one in which he himself lifted up his voice and said, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" He commands attention. He demands from us a hearing, and a decision. Still as of old he is saying, "What think ye of the Christ; whose Son is he?" We can fix no limit to space, for bevond our proposed boundary there again is space. So it is with Jesus when we attempt to define him in terms that are merely manlike. With utmost pains we complete all such definitions, and we adorn them with many a eulogium, only to look up and see the Christ standing far beyond the boundaries we had fixed, and c mpelling us to follow all our human formulas with the logical, mathematical sign of plus. It is this in Christ that is other than we, and more, this that is undefinable and incomparable, that must be accounted f r. And if finally we should discover that it is as unaccountable as it is undefinable and incomparable, could we not then quite rationally settle down to the conviction that he himself has given to us the only possible account of himself in his matchless Godward claims? To know Christ as a Galilean only is to know him but in part. It were comparatively a small matter to see him the greatest man of his own age and nation: but to see him the greatest of all men of all ages, and from that climax of manhood reaching higher still by tar and laying claim to Godhood-it is this that challenges us! It is this that makes him such an unfailing comfort to the growing multitudes of his disciples in all lands, and such a perpetual problem to those who hold their hearts aloof from him.

CAUSES OF THE PRESENT DIS-TURBANCES IN CHINA.

BY S. T. WILLIS.

An interview with the Rev. James Ware, just from the seat of trouble and who was 20 years a missionary in that Empire, under the Foreign Christian Missionary Society.

As the public is holding an interrogation mark on the Chinese situation, any light that can be thrown upon the status of affairs and the causes of the uprising is welcomed. With this thought in mind I sought of the Rev. James Ware, who has just landed at New York, to know the causes of the Chinese disturbances as they appear to one twenty years a resident of that Empire. Very ready to help the American people understand the situation as it really is, Mr. Ware said: I would divide the causes leading to the present uprisings, more or less all over China, into two general classes:

- I. NATIVE CAUSES, under which I will enumerate five special causes; and,
- II. FOREIGN CAUSES, which also I will support under five particular heads.
- 1. Among the native causes, I would assign the first place to Confucianism which, as a system, teaches that the power of civil reform resides in the people. Whenever an official is not acting right, Confucianism declares that the people have the perfect right to revolt and institute a new order of things. This system of teachings holds that the Emperor should be in very truth a father to the people, as well as a ruler of the land. Dr. Faber, without doubt one of the profoundest scholars China has yet known, says: "During the last 2,000 years China has seen 50 great rebellions, besides local disturbances which are of annual occurrence, traceable directly to the teachings of Mercius."
- 2. Hatred toward the present Dynasty is a potent cause of the general destruction and death. For several years revolutionary proptecies have been afloat in many parts of the kingdom which, claiming that the end of the present Dynasty is at hand, call upon the people to get ready for a new government and a new order of things in general. The Emperor, as is generally known, is not a Chinaman, but a Manchu; and his court also is composed of Marchurians, as are his representatives in almost all the large cities such as Canton, Hang Chow, Nankin and Soo Chow. In each of these centers of population he is represented by a permanent garrison, strongly intrenched in the walled cities, within the cities. These representatives of his majesty, with their families and servants, live in luxury, but by no work of their own. They are pensioners of the government. This order of things the people resent. Of late years the Chinese have endeavored to institute reforms against these Manchurian abuses and in favor of their own countrymen. It is their fixed purpose to drown out all Manchurian authority and power in the land.

- 3. The growth of public opinion is one of the most effective causes back of all these disturbances; and this has been brought about very largely by the circulation of mag azines and daily newspapers, which are published much after the foreign style of peri odicals. This is especially true of the daily papers, which are circulated extensively in the coast and river towns and thence into the interior towns and cities. These publications, burdened with their messages of reform, little by little take hold of the people and the result is their dissatisfaction with the present order of things. All telegrams of general importance in foreign papers, in London, Paris and New York, are published the following day in the great Chinese dailies. It is an interesting fact that most, if not all, of these publications are registered in the name of foreigners, though really owned and controlled by the Chinese capitalists. This is done to prevent them from being suppressed by the government au: horities.
- 4. As a result of these agencies, reform societies have been established in the most important cities in China, notably in Pekin, where no less a personage than the Emperor hinself was at the head of the movement. And just before the coup d'etat he purchased a large consignment of books which he ordered through Mr. Ware's brother-in law, Dr. Gatrell who was at that time the agent of the American Bible Society in Pekin. These reform societies may be checked in their efforts, but they will not be destroyed, for the necessity of reformation has laid deep and permanent hold upon thousands of the best minds in China. The story of the Enpress' usurpation of the throne and the awful results in suffering and death is a matters of history and are well known, but instead of suppressing the reform movements her policy will inevitably tend to foster and spread them as never before. One of the direct and immediate results of her movement is the suppression of "official squeezing" which was very largely responsible for the general stagnation of trade, and the destruction of all efforts at progress. The Chinese have a proverb which is aptly illustrated in this connection. They say, "The large fishes eat the small fishes; the small fishes eat the shrimps; and the shrimps eat the mud."
- 5. The fifth and last cause of disturbance among the natives is in the influence of the returned, educated, thinking Chinamen who augment very largely the reform forces. In their residence abroad they have learned many things which will never allow them to be again satisfied with native Chinese conditions. In foreign lands they are allowed to acquire wealth and keep it, which at first is a great surprise to them; for in China whenever a man begins to amass a fortune, the officials come down on him in one way or another, and unless he has personal power with the authorities his property will be taken from him. Hence, Chinamen at home have but little encouragement to make money. But when many return from foreign lands with wealth, and rich in personal experiences of good governments protecting their persons and property, they set about to teach their fellow countrymen valuable lessons in governmental reform.

The foreign causes may be enumerated at great length, but in my opinion there are five which comprehend all that justly should be considered in this connection.

- 1. First among these is the opium traffic, which is to be blamed for much of the distress and trouble in China to-day. In all my travels as a missionary in the interior, whenever I told the people that I was a subject of Great Britain, men of intelligence and thought would instantly say: "Oh yes, that's the country that sends us opium!" And they themselves trace much of their misery and degradation directly to this curse. In fact, some would lay all their troubles at the door of the opium traffic, and therefore would charge it all up to the account of Great Britain, though this conclusion is neither logical or just.
- 2. Second among foreign causes is the Earth-Hunger of the nations which have had their greedy hands upon China. For years Russia has been absorbing Manchuria, the ancestral home of the Emperor. The chief naval ports of the north, Port Arthur and Wei Hai Wei, have been annexed by Russia and Great Britain respectively. Germany has taken to herself a large slice out of the Shantung province on the east; England has annexed a large strip on the mainland opposite Hong Kong; Japan now rules in Formosa; France in the south has taken the ancient Chinese dependencies of Ton King: and many troubles have existed between Chinese and the British officials in the far west on the Burmese boundary. Influential foreign papers have printed shaded maps showing "the spheres of influence" of the nations in China. These maps have found their way into the Central Government at Pekin and into the offices of viceroys and governors throughout the land. Besides, the treaty ports, which are conceded to be the wealtaiest cities in China, are generally regarded as foreign territory because they are ruled entirely by the foreigners in them, and, although the Chinese pay far the larger part of the taxes, they have no representative in the councils. It mears to them heavy taxation without representation. Only the mutual jealousy of the foreign powers and the fear of international complications have prevented the rival nations hitherto from dismembering China. No nation (except Russia) has had a definite policy during the last ten years, and hence the weakness shown by the several powers during recent years in their willingness to accept monetary indemnities whenever life and property have been destroyed by Chinese revolutionists.

- 3. Injudicious statements and criticisms of the Chinese Government, and particularly of Chinese officials, by the foreign press is a fruitful source of disturbance. Foreign papers are taken by all the Chinese officials and are translated to them daily, especially is this true of foreign papers published in China, of which there are many. In this way the Government in all its branches is kept constantly in touch with all political, educational, religious, and military movements of other nations.
- 4. Another cause is that of cruelty toward the Chinese on the part of certain foreign rs in the treaty ports. It is no uncommon thing to see a foreigner driving along in his dog-cart lash a Chinaman out of the way with his whip if he does not get quickly out of the road. The police force in Shanghai, for instance, is composed of foreigners, Siks, and Chinese constables. The Siks wear red hats and are called by the Chinese "red-headed devils" on account of their cruelty. Frequently even the highbred Chinese are shamefully treated by cruel, heartless foreigners. This, of course, has its effect upon the people and plays a part in the present troubles.
- 5. The Roman Catholic usurpation of official duties is yet another cause of the sad situation. Last year the Chinese Government conferred official status on all missionaries, irrespective of creed or nationality, which signified that a bishop or superintendent would be ranked with the viceroy, while the missionary would be classed as on an equal footing with the magistrates in their respective districts. Thus the missionaries would be empowered to call upon and confer with officials as with equals. When this edict appeared the Protestant missionaries throughout China met in their different stations and conferred as to the best disposition to make of the matter. In Shanghai the American missionaries met at the invitation of Consul-General Conger, he himself being present. After much discussion and deliberation they came to the conclusion that they would have nothing to do with official status. Their action was also in accord with all other Protestant missionaries in China, for all believed that as they were there as the representatives of Christ, they should not accept official relations that would put them and their work in a false position before the people. The Roman Catholic missionaries, however, accepted the official status and began at once to usurp efficial duties. By taking these duties out of the hands of the magistrates, they are belittled in the eyes of their own people, hence the widespread and bitter antagonism of officials toward the missionaries, especially toward the Roman Catholics.

Mr. Ware does not deny, however, that the missionaries are trying to bring about reforms; and says we must expect that the present order of things will be upset in China, but the blame for the present trouble was never laid upon the missionaries until the officials began to look about for some one on whom to fasten the responsibility of these outrages. It is not true that the missionaries are despised, but on the other hand the Protestant missionaries are loved and honored throughout China. All through my 20 years of work in tha Empire I have met opposition only from the officials. This testimony is also in general accord with all other missionaries in all parts of the kingdom of the Celestials.

AARON PRINCE ATEN.

From all the land to where Missouri's flood Sweeps onward to its rest in Ocean's bed, Have gathered earnest hosts of God's elect With purpose pure, and hearts with holy thought All filled to fullness, and with love unfeigned, Intent as by behest of heaven's King To bear the tidings of eternal truth To utmost metes and bounds of earth's broad belt.

Amid these workers in the world's great field Are some with hearts bound close by mystic tie— A brotherhord from common mother sprung— A mother beautiful as erst the past Has known, with every grace and goodness crowned,

Who meet to celebrate with loving hearts,
With "feast of reason and with flow of soul,"
And Alma Ma'er crown with mystic wreaths.
A few with whitened heads, the crown of life;
And some with silver mingled with the gold,
Sixteen to one perchance, in parlance now;
While some in manhood's strength and prime and pride,

Or youth's abounding hopefulness and faith—
All cowe to feel the rush of memory's flood
As, surging from the years of long ago,
It awee: a in fullness o'er our spirits now,
And carries them of on its bold, resistless tide.

Lay we aside the carking cares of life For this brief hour of gladness and of joy; And as we look in other's face once more, Let reminiscence have her perfect work. Tread we again dear Alma Mater's halls; Hear we once more the old familiar bell As peals out clear the m ring, call to prayer; Familiar voices hushed for ver more Salute again our eager, listening ears; Our inner consciousness, alert and rapt Feels round about the touch of mystic hands; Behold our eyes the teachers tried and true Who guided safe our feet up learning's mount; And grasp we once again the friendly hands Of fellow students passed b-yond the veil-The royal comrades of the early years Called all too soon from earthly sights and scenes; The sweet, bright faces and the fairy forms That cheered and gladdened all our gloomy hours, Yet stole so soon and silently from earth.

Alumni et alumnae strong and brave,
While meet we in this blest reunion rare
It intercharge of heartfelt sentiment,
And flash from soul to soul the electric sparks
Of love and blessing for each other's weal;
While talk we of the unreturning past,
And feed our souls on all the present joys,
Let prescience peer with eager, earnest gaze
Into a future filled with my tery veiled,
Yet great in glory for the valiant hosts
Who battle bravely for eternal right.
As close we up the record of the old,
And stand upon the threshold of the new,
The bright new century that welcomes us
With open doors and aisles for duty's feet,
May new determination fill our hearts,
And gladness great that we may bear a part
In strife so sure of heaven's high reward.

So now may this reunion be for us
An earnest of another great and grand,
Where all the beauty of 'h'eternal hills
Shill break upon our unveil-d vision bright,
And where once more our spirit hands shall clasp
In recognition sure and sweet and swift,
And visions through the vistas grand and broad
Shall sweep in wondrous beauty o'er our souls.

HOW TO STUDY THE PROPHET-IC LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.*

BY M. B. RYAN.

I. Some "Don'ts."

- 1. Don't become discouraged by the things "hard to be understood." No book can be mastered at a first reading; least of all a Bible book. The prophetic books are not the easiest of the Bible books to understand. The higher the mountain the longer the climb. The unobstructed vision is gained only when the top is reached. But meanwhile, there are enchanting views and fresh inspirations at every turn as you go up.
- 2. Don't become confused by conflicting interpretations of, and theories about, the prophecies. Let the "interpreters" and the "theorizers" alone for awhile. Look at the prophetic literature through your own eyes. You will find no end of beauties that are undisputed.
- 3. Don't be satisfied with a superficial knowledge of the prophecies. Climb high. Not only will you see new sights, but the old beauties will be seen in new lights.

II. THINGS TO REMEMBER.

- 1. The prophets were men "of like passions with us." While their message was divine their manner was human. They differ in their way of presenting their message as widely as men do now. The difference in style between Macaulay and Carlyle is not more marked than can be discerned between different prophetical writers. Due attention should be given to this difference of manner. It will add to both the interest and the profit of the study.
- 2. The prophets were Hebrews. They had a race-peculiarity as well as individual-peculiarities. Their race history and character form the fitting background to their messages. An acquaintance with the history of Israel is a necessary preparation for a profitable study of the prophecies.
- 3. Different prophets spoke and wrote at different periods. As far as possible, each prophet's writings should be studied in their proper place in the history. Only when the picture is in its own niche in the historical gallery are the "lights" best suited to it, so that it can be studied to best advantage.
- 4. The prophets were seers. We cannot see what they saw unless we get their standpoint. That was a very high standpoint spiritually. A spiritual preparation is necessary to an understanding of the prophecies. Perhaps nowhere is Paul's saying more literally true than here, that the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; and he cannot know them because they are spiritually judged. This explains how it was that the great mass of their contem poraries mi-judged the prophets. "History" and "dogma" may be grasped by the carnal mind. Prophecy requires the spiritual mind for its comprehension.
- 5. The prophets were the great TEACH-ERS of Israel. Prophecy is not simply "fore-

- telling." These men had a message for their own times, of present significance to their people.
- 6. While their messages were in great part primarily to the people of their day, and of immediate importance, they dealt with the truth of things; and truth is eternal. Their messages have, therefore, always a present interest and importance.

III. THINGS TO Do.

- 1. As a preparation for the study, read, if possible, the prophet under consideration entire at one sitting. If not at one sitting, then consecutively until completed. This gives sweep to vision and helps to preserve the harmony of the study.
- 2. Use such helps as will enable you to get clearly the historical background and the proper historical and personal setting of the book. The man must become as familiar as possible to you before the message will be most easily understood and appreciated. For this purpose the Bethany handbooks, "A Guide to Bible Study," by McGarvey, and "The Prophets of Israel," by Willett, cannot be excelled. The latter is especially devoted to this purpose. It is brief, concise and luminous. A careful use of it in connection with the study of the prophetic books cannot fail to be greatly helpful. The section of the former work devoted to the prophets will also be found of great value. Those who have the time and opportunity will find many more voluminous works which render great assistance.

In this way the situation and the particular aim of the prophet under consideration will be readily seen. We will see Jeremiah in Jerusalem and Ezekiel by the River Chebar in Babylon, each with his own task, yet with a common aim-to prepare Israel for the doom which both saw to be inevitable. We will see Isaiah with visions of the distant storm before him, struggling with Judah's apostasy and eddeav ring by a renovation of the nation's faith and purity to avert the disaster. And we will see Haggai and Zechariah with the wreck and ruin of the storm all about them, stirring the remnant of the people to rebuild the wrecked temple, to re-constitute the worship of God in their own home land, and thus to rehabilitate the nation as the chosen p ople of God. We will see Amos starting from his farm in Tekoa and appearing, like an apparition, before the luxurious and debauched rulers of Israel at Bethel, to fling at their ears such a ringing message of rebuke and reproof as they had never heard; a message, however, which they little heeded. And we will see Jonah, sobered by startling experiences, journeying to far Nineveh to preach a message of warning somewhat similar to that of Amos and with better success.

3. Place yourself, as far as possible, side by side with those to whom the prophet wrote. The standpoint of the hearer is as necessary to the understanding of the prophecies as that of the speaker. The message, being divine, was adapted to those to whom it was sent. We must see it from the place where it found them.

This emphasizes again the necessity of au intimate acquaintance with the history and condition of the people.

4. Notice and study closely the symbolism of the prophets. In no part of the Bible is the use of figures more profuse or more instructive than in the prophecies of the Old Testament. You can scarce open at random to a section of these books that does not contain more or less figurative language, and many portions abound with it. Some of the books, like Hosea and Ezekiel, are largely composed of symbols. Single chapters, like the second of Jeremiah, have a dozen different and suggestive figures, illustrating Israel's condition, past or present or to come; or her attitude toward God and his dealings with her. An intelligent appreciation of these figures will go a great way toward a mastery of the meaning of the prophecies.

5. Study the various "visions" of the prophets singly. In eleven chapters of Isaiah there are as many visions or "burdens which Isaiah the son of Amoz did see," concerning different nations and peoples. Each vision is a picture in the larger picture of the book. The impress on which the whole prophecy makes upon us will depend much upon this study in detail of its several features.

A careful and reverent study of these Old Testament messages is greatly needed in our day. Many of the conditions and situations prevailing then can be duplicated in our civilization. The insight, the zeal and the courage of the prophets to see and rebuke wrongs and to plead for righteousness is one of the great needs of the present. Were Isaiah or Amos or Hosea here now they might, very aptly, with a few adaptations, repeat many of their most startling and scathing messages. There is need that these messages lay hold of the consciences of God's people and find utterance anew.

THE CONVENTION AND ITS LESSONS.

W. T. MOORE.

The recent National Convention of the Disciples at Kansas City was an inspiration. While the spell is upon us, it may be well to consider carefully some matters which seem to be important in the light of all the facts of the case.

- 1. The size of the Convention.—Much can be said in favor of a great mass-meeting, such as the Convention has come to be. But there are weighty reasons why these conventions should be more restricted. Indeed, they must be more restricted in the future, unless some radical changes are made in the programs. At present, nothing is quite satisfactory. Even as a mass-meeting, some important elements are wanting. Certainly from a business point of view the whole thing is a failure.
- 2. The time allotted for the Convention.— This is not long en ugh. The first meeting shou'd certainly be held on Tuesday evening, and the last, not before the Thursday evening of the next week. This would give two clear days more than we now have, and few, if any, would be inconvenienced thereby. Most everyone can reach the Convention for Tuesday as easily as for Thursday, and the advantage gained would be very great. At Kansas City, though the Silver Jubilee of the Foreign Society was celebrated, that society had only one day for all that was said and done.

3. The use of the Press.—The Disciples have not vet learned the value of printer's ink. At any rate they do not seem to know how to use it. The convection at Kansas City was shamefully reported. The daily press seemed to have little or no conception as to what the convention repr-sented. But the press should not be blamed too severely. There was little provision made for the accommodation of reporters. They ought to have had ample room at convenient tables, set apart for their special use. Then they ought to have been served by one of the most competent men in the convention, to deal with press matters. Our daily newspapers are always ready to print whatever will be appreciated by the public, provided the copy, in good shape, is furnished to the reporters. Speaking broadly there ought to be at least two official reporters appointed by the convention each year, and it should be the business of these to furnish the press-men with all the help that is needed. Of course any wide-awake newspaper will see to it that some hing appears in its columns about such a convention as the Disciples hold; but often the very thing is published that ought to be omitted, while many things that are omitted ought to fill considerable space. All this can be regulated by a wise management through the officials of the convention.

A few suggestions may not be out of place with respect to the future program. things must be clearly obvious to everyone who has thought much about the matter. First, there are too many special addresses, and secondly, there is altogether too much reading of these addresses in the convention. There ought not to be a single set address before the main body of the convention except at night, and then we ought to have one address on each evening by the very ablest man whose services can be obtained, without any respect whatever to the position which he occupies. I hold it to be absolutely inexcusable to take up the time of the delegates with any address that has not received the most careful preparation by a first-class man. This address should not be read, though it may be written and committed to memory. Long essays read be fore a popular audience are usually very tiresome. But this is not all. These essays are not needed, and consequently should have no place on the program where time is such an important factor.

However, if these set addresses must be given, let there be sectional meetings provided to hear them; but let all the meetings in the main hall be devoted to hearing the reports of the respective boards; the reports of the various committees; and the consideration of such other matters as may be deemed important. In short, let all the day sessions in the main hall be devoted to the real business of the convention.

This plan would give opportunity to discuss freely all important questions relating to our work. At present the report of the board is not even read, except in a very brief abstract. There is scarcely ever any discussion with respect to anything the various committees say. The net result is the business of the convention is rushed through without any careful consideration. and usually everything is forgotten before the convention adjourns. What is needed is that all business matters (and I mean by this everything relating to our practical work) should be discussed enough to impress the main points upon the delegates; but this cannot be done without more time than is now allowed for the hearing and disposal of

But still a more important matter remains to be noticed. At present no less than at least three-fourths of all the delegates practically take no part in the convention. They are there as an audience, and they seem to have no other function. Now, this becomes tiresome after awhile. It certainly does become monotonous; and it will not be continued for an indefinite length of time. But the moment these delegates are reckoned with in the convention, and allowed to express themselves freely upon the matters under consideration, that moment will they feel a new interest in all the proceedings; and when the convention adjourns they will go home full of enthusiasm and impart this to their respective congregations. Stereoperfunctity never carries with it enthusiasm. It may dispose of business in a sort of humdrum way, but it always fails to inspire those who are its subjects with loyalty to the cause it seeks to represent. It is quite possible to have harmony which does not make music. It is better to have some discord in the right place than to have too much harmony in the wrong place. There may be evils in a popular discussion, but nothing can exceed the evil of confining discussion between brackets that kill it, and in the hands of a few persons who are credited with always trying "to run things."

I would make our conventions popular in the best sense. But I would nake them useful before every other consideration. Our work has now reached wide dimensions. We have ceased to be a little and despised folk. Our missionary operations are at least respectable. We are beginning to touch the borders of a decided success. We have certainly reached the manhood period, and we should now put away childish things. We cannot afford any longer to pay our fare to these great conventions simply for the purpose of making an audience for a few men who are appointed to read essays, however good these essays may be. For the most part they are generally very excellent in their way, but this is not the thing to be most desired. We want to consider the state of the cause in these great gatherings; and we cannot do this effectively unless we shall hear from the counties. The plan I have suggested would bring the convention into touch with the churches through representative delegates, and in this way the meetings would be much more interesting to the delegates generally than they now are, and certainly much more profitable in helping to carry on our great work.

I have made these suggestions thus early, because I hope that next year at Minneapolis a program will be prepared which will avoid some of the mistakes that have been made in recent years. I know that in order to secure the best results the making of this program should not be delayed very long, especally as it regards speeches; for no man ought to allow himself to come before one of these great conventions with an address that has not cost him at least a year's preparation. When our speakers take this view of the matter, we may hope to hear something that is really worthy of the occasion, provided the program committee see to it that none but able men are selected for this service.

SOME OBJECT LESSONS IN CHRISTIAN ENTERPRISE.

EDWARD B. BAGBY.

Benevolences and education are the two great problems that confront our people at the present time. In evangelism we surpass all the great religious bodies of this country. In offerings for missions, when we take into consideration our ability and our growing interest, we do not suffer in comparison with them. We have a Church Extension Fund growing beautifully more every year, that will soon begin to meet the demands made upon it. It is only when we consider our benevolent institutions and the endowment of our colleges that we have reason to feel ashamed. It is the purpose of this letter to show what may be accomplithed when interest is aroused upon this subject.

At the recent S ate Convention in Baltimore, a hundred or more delegates were greatly interested in a visit to the Christian Tribune Home for Working Girls, the only benevolen institution of the Disciples of Christ upon the Atlantic Coast. It was difficult to believe that such a successful enterprise could have grown in a few years from an offering of eleven cents.

In presenting the claims of the Christian Tribune in Strasburg, Va., in 1895, Editor Peter Ainslie mentioned the need of a Working Girls' Home. At the close of the service a poorly clad girl cane for ward and put in Bro. A's hands oins to the amount of eleven cents, saying, "It is all I have," and, turning away in tears, quickly disappeared. In four years this small sum had grown to $2,000, which was sufficient to purchase a suitable house at 805 W. Fayette St., Baltimore. There is a ground rent of $1,500 in the property which will be redeemed in 1902

In producing this happy result Bro. Ainslie had to meet great opposition and bear the brunt of considerable ridicule. Once when Bro. Ainslie, who is a bachelor, made an appeal for the home, some one suggested that he should provide a home for one good girl rather than to be interested in a home for gir's at large. Bro. Ainslie was in no manner discouraged and has now the satisfaction of knowing that fifty young women have enjoyed the privileges of the Home, that they have been provided with good board at the cost of $200 a week and have on deposit over $100 saved from their wages. The institution is truly a home. Its affairs are conducted by a matron and fifteen lady managers. There are firms in Baltimore who send regularly to the Home for employees and every resident of the Home has an opportunity of earning a living at fair wages. While going through the Home I stopped in on a of the rooms to ask some questions of two of the young ladies. I found one was from near my home in Virginia and the other the niece of a United States Senator.

The Home is a boon for young women thrown upon their own resources and the good to be accomplished there in the years to come is beyond all estimate.

In the planting of the American University n this city we have an object lesson of what may be done by hearty and persistent effort. This great enterprise is under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The initial step was taken in 1892, when the General Conference declared it to be "the duty of the Protestant Church to provide in the city of Washington a university, Christian, catholic, tolerant and American, having for its sole aim post-graduate and professional study and research."

Five years after the receipt of the first subscription the Board of Trustees was able to announce the total assets of the university to be $2 500,000. These assets include the site, a magnificent plat of ninety-three acres of ground on an extension of Massa chusetts Avenge, four miles from the Capitol. One building, the Hall of History, has been completed at a cost of $176,000. Besides this, $380,000 in cash and subscriptions have been secured for other buildings and endowmen. The trustees are asking for $10,000 000 and contemplate the er-crion of twenty-three buildings of marble and granite. The preachers of the Methodist Church have subscribed $80,000 oward the erection of Asbary Hall which is to cost at least $100,000. The young people are being enlisted and are pouring in a steady stream of money to build and endow the Epworth College of Literature. Bishop John F. Hurst, the prime mover in this work, has appealed to the patriotic impulses of the people of various states. As a result, there will soon be built the Ohio College of Government, the Pennsylvania Hall of Administration and the Mary'and College of Physics. The American University is receiving a liberal share of the Twentieth Century thank offering of $10 000 000 now being raised by the Methodist Church. "What is the difference between the Friends and Me'hodists?" was once asked. The reply was, "The Friends are Quakers while the Methodists are Earth quakers." In the establishment of the American University the Methodists are giving a new proof of their right to this title.

HUNTING A PASTOR.

J. H. SMART.

With many a church this has been a wearisome duty. Every church wants a good pastor, if it wants one at all. The pulpit has become vacant, or is about to become vacant, and the elders or the official board or a committee selected for this special work, commence looking about for the preacher they think will be of the greatest service to the church. Sometimes they advertise the vacant pulpit in the hope that out of the many applicants they may be able to find the man most suited to the work in their field. They are simply deluged with letters if the pulpit is one of any prominence, and their tribulations increase from day to day. They receive letters from a few who announce their coming in a few days, and that they hope no one will be engaged prior to their com ng. Such are confident of their ability to work wonders in the community.

But the decision is finally reached to invite a number of the applicants, in regular order, to come on trial. They never fail to come, and in the ord-r specified, and each one imagines that he will be the chosen prophet to lead that Israel on to victory. They make a display of the best sermons they have, or try to at least, then go home to await a call from the church. The members of the church are divided over those whom they have heard preach, and in many instances they fail to agree on any one. But finally, in their desperation, they extend a call to the preacher who will be of the least service to them. They make this mistake chiefly because trial sermons, under subc conditions as named above, cannot be relied upon as decisive means of knowing a preacher, his pulpit power, his pastoral work, or his standing as a man. A visit with two trial sermons preached is the poorest means that could be adopted to find a good pastor or a good preacher. Our churches ought to abandon this m-thod of selecting a preacher, for it is wholly unreliable and often ruinous to the charch.

There is a better way than the above, a more sensible way to find a good pastor, and it ought to be adopted by our churches, and in fact by all churches that employ preachers as we do. 1. Take a preacher's record where he has lived and labored. Has he succeeded? Has he kept the church out of trouble, and himself out of trouble? Does he stand well in the community? Is he noted as a good man, a good preacher? 2. If the church wanting hin is still in doubt of his preaching ability to fill the pulpit acceptably, select a committee of members who are julges of preaching and preachers and send them to the place the man is preaching and let them hear him as strangers in the community, without the preacher's knowing who they are or why they are in his congregation. They will hear him preach such sermons as he preaches all the time in his every day work, and they will see him as he is. In nine cases out of ten a selection made in this way will be satisfactory, and the church will never get an unworthy preacher.

INTO ALL THE WORLD.

BY PRESTON BELL HALL.

The command to "go" is certainly emphatic, and comes from the highest authority in the universe. And it is not an indefinite command. The boundaries of the commission are well defined. "The field is the world." "Go ye into all the world." The messenger of Christ knows no halting place, until the gospel has been preached in every kingdom, republic, pr vince, state, county and town in all the earth. Every continent, every island of the sea, wherever man is found, there must the preacher go. And, to be yet more emphatic, the command to "go" is not obeyed until every man and every woman and child in all the earth has heard the glad tidings of salvation from sin and of life eternal. "To every creature," the Lord said, must the message go. To the king on his throne; to the peasant in his hut; to the great general who commands an army; to the common soldier in the ranks; to the judge upon the bench; to the criminal behind the prison bars; to men of all races, colors, occupations, must the man of God proclaim the truth.

The church has always been slow to comprehend the wideness and imperativene s of the commission of Christ. He had commanded his apostles to 'tarry in the city of Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high." But they seemed slow to understand that Jerusalem must be only a starting place, and not the permanent seat of the church. Not till Stephen was martyred and the church scattered by persecution did the preachers go everywhere proclaiming the word. But even then they preached only to the Jews who dwelt in foreign cities. Peter, we know, was taught by a vision that the gospel was for all men, and then told by the Spirit to go to the Gentile Cornelius.

It is a common misfortune of our human weakness to make the effort to accom nodate the greatness of things divine to the smallness of our conceptions. To the child the sky seems to touch the earth all around him, and he is ready to affirm that the world is no larger than the circle of his horizon. So do men try to compass the infinity of truth by the limit itions of their own powers and make the effort to squeeze love into the infinitesimal mold of their own selfishness. "Go," to them, means stay at home where they are comfortable, and "into all the world" is made to read, "to me and my wife, my son John and his wife, we four and no more." And this mistake of men who love the truth has held back the growth of the kingdom and has kept out of the Christ millions who might have heard had the church learned that she exists for the purpose of sounding out the word, and not to hold it in her creeds nor to make it of no effect by putting it in a strait-jacket of dogma.

It seems strange to some, it will seem marvelous to all of us one day, how a Disciple of Christ can make a distinction in his feelings between foreign and home missionary work. But the strangest thing of all is that a preacher who will quote with much fervor the Lord's announcement that "all authority in heaven and in earth is given unto me," when he wishes to impress upon his audience the importance of the rite of baptism, needs further proof than the Master's command to "go into all the world" to convince him of the divine right of missions.

And after all why does any one, in the face of this divine commission, need missionary sermons and exhortations to persuade him to give his money? Because of unbelief. We do not believe in him if we do not feel the force of his command to go and preach. If we were full of faith and the Holy Spirit (and these are never separated) we would be glad to obey the voice of him who "Bids us nor sit nor stand, but go." Ebensburg, Pa.

ENGLISH TOPICS.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN TRAVELERS.

Once more for a brief spell I am on the wing, flying this time southward with the migrating swallows. These lines are being penned in an earthly paradise near what was once converted into a terrestrial inferno. I am at Sorrento, that spot in Italy which basks in almost perpetual sunshine, and breathes an atmosphere perennially pure. Ambrosia is in the air. The olive clad mountains are behind. The Bay of Naples, a mirror of heaven, is in front. Yonder across the Bay smokes Vesuvius. To day I have been ransacking Pompeii. That is why I say that Sorrento, the celestial, adjoins the spot of earth which once was a raging hell. Oh how powerfully has providence preserved for us the evidences of the truth of Paul's writings as well as of Pliny's! Pompeii and Herculaneum were sealed up under rivers of lava and beds of pumice ashes, in order that from the hour of the awful eruption there might be kept for future ages one irrefutable testimony to the depravity of old paganism under Imperial Rone. I have spent a day or two at Luzarro, Spezzia, Rome and Nables, and have reached this point on the way to Sicily. A dear old friend thought he would like to treat me to a holiday, after a year of hard work in my beloved sphere of London ministry. Accordingly I am now on my vacation, rather late in autumn. I am pleased to find that there are everywhere quite as many Americans touring in Europe as there are English people; and these representatives of the two great nations appear uniformly to fraternize most eagerly. The American travelers to England for the most part take some portion of the continent into their plan of a tour. Many are drifting into Italy and several are at this moment in this Hotel Tramontano, under the orange groves of sunny Sorrento, the birthplace of Torquato Tasso, the immortal poet. But I have not found any yet who are going to Sicily. Mo t are turning back at Naples to take the steamer at Genoa for America. I will in my next letter give my impressions of Sicily as I shall by the time I next write have seen that isle so rich in archæology, architecture, and ecclesiology and so romantic in i.s beauty of scenery.

WHY ENGLAND HAS GONE TORY.

The General Election is practically over in England, and it has according to popular opinion decisively settled the fact that the Liberals are out in the cold shades of opposition, and the Tories in the place of power. for the next five years. I cannot myself easily believe anything of the sort. For the Tory government has stolen a march on the nation by snatching a tactical advantage at an opportune moment. Salisbury Balfour and Chamberlain knew that the people would expect them to see the country through the crisis crea ed by the Boer war, and they knew that by springing an election on, as now, they would gain an enormous "Khaki vote." Their presumption is justified by the result. But, although they are continuing in power, some acute observers are convinced that the tide of public opinion is about to turn, and that very strongly against Tory-The national feeling in approval of the war was secured by the insane ultimatum hurled at the British Empire by Kruger. What else could happen? What great nation would have endured that outrageous insult, even if it had been doubtful or uncertain as to rights and wrongs? Therefore the government which took up the shameful challenge has very naturally received a national endorsement, upon appealing for the pronouncement of public opinion. And yet, the war will prove to have been only a passing incident, and in a very brief period the people will want attention to other interests. That attention will be exactly what Lord Salisbury will be incapable of giving. "Peace, Retrench nent, and Reform" will soon again become the grand watchwords of our advanced parties, and only the Liberals will be reckoned to possess the combined faculties of ability and inclination to carry measures indicated by those terms.

AND NOW, WHY HAVE YOU SENT DOWIE!

Well, we have been treated to Lorimer. Bradford, Bevan, and Talmage, and have reveled in their preaching, as well as in once more hearing the musical voice of Sankey. But oh, my American friends, why have you per contra inflicted this Chicago Zionist upon us? Dr. Dowie is in London. I did not leave England to flee from Dowie, but I might almost have done so. But I cannot escape him. At the very first hotel on the continent where I halted I found in the reading-room "Leaves of Haling," the organ in which page after page is filled with a distracting hash of the most singular the ology imaginable, all either from the pen of Dowie or from the missives of his disciples. One of the largest buildings in London, the Holborn Town Hall, is the scene of Dr. Dowie's opening campaign in the metropolis. He had a somewhat rough beginning, for he was freely "heckled" by hearers who had come to catechize him about his miracles. This put the Doctor out of temper not a little, so that a lively scene ensued. And vet, although this pretentious and impudent claimant for universal credulity approaches blasphemy, like those of the Reverend Mother Eddy, I am bound to say that his indictments of physicians and churches are only too just. Furthermore, the way in which thousands have flocked to his standard in America must be accepted as a proof that in some way he is supplying what many ardent souls sincerely desire, which the churches have not furnished. In age after age of apostasy from Christian simplicity, Christian power has been largely lost, but the hunger of the human heart is as strong as ever. And what the soul wants it will go on trying to gain.

Sorrento, near Naples, Italy, Oct. 18, 1900.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

"Name six books, please, the reading of which has been most profitable to you during the year 1900."

It is impossible for me to name any number of books that, during any designated period, have been most profitable to me. One book is valuable for one thing, while another is equally profitable for a different reason. I will, however, briefly speak of a few books that have been helpful to me.

I have recently read "The Man of Galilee," by Atticus G. Haggard. It is a small volume, worth, probably, seventy-five cents. Any thoughtful person will be helped in his faith, and so in his entire spiritual life, by the reading of this little book. It seems to have been prepared especially for young persons. It is a clear and strong presentation of Jesus as the Son of God. I do not now think of a more profitable book than, the one here named for the purpose indicated. It is an excellent book to place in the hands of one who is in doubt as to the nature, character and official position of Jesus of Nazareth.

"The Student's Life of Jesus," by Prof. Gilbert, of the Chicago Theological Seminary, is an exceedingly interesting and, to me, valuable book. It is of an entirely different character from the one just mentioned. The reading of it, however, was as profitable for the end in view-a lucid unfolding of the life of Jesus among men, with a critical handling of our sources of information, that is to say the four gospels. Dr. Gilbert's study of the relation of the four writers to each other is critical and, from my point of view, eminently satisfactory. The question is: Were Matthew, Mark and Luke dependent on each other in the preparation of their narratives concerning Jesus? Did they borrow from each other? Prof. Gilbert shows conclusively that they wrote independently. As a result of the reading of this book one's confidence in the testimony of those on whom we chiefly rely for our knowledge of the Nazarene is increased.

"The Revelation of Jesus," by the same author, vexed me from first to last. As I read "The Student's Life of Jesus," and received help, I found myself saying, "How could the author of this book produce such a volume as "The Revelation of Jesus?"

The reading of the last-named book was as distinct an injury to me as the reading of the "Life of Jesus" was intellectually and spiritually helpful. You have heard that what is food for one may be prison for another. Much, too, depends on one's intellectual and spritual condition. A book that may possess value at one time may be valueless at another—to the same person, on account of a change in condition either mental or moral, or both.

One of the most accomplished biblical scholars with whom I am acquainted, spoke in my presence in terms of praise and in a spirit of enthusiasm of "The Life of Jesus of Nazareth," by Prcf. Rush Rhees—a book which, when I read it, had absolutely nothing for me. Hearing what this master among the teachers of the Bible said, I quietly resolved to read the book again. I may not have been in a condition to be helped by Prof. Rhees.

I am so built as to sometimes get a great deal of help from a writer with whose position I have but little or no sympathy. "Christianity and Anti-Christianity in Their Final Conflict," by Samuel J. Andrews, may be mentioned in this connection. Samuel J. Andrews is the author of the well-known "Life of Our Lord Upon the Earth." I opened his "Christianity and Anti-Christianity," therefore, with a conscious prejudice in its favor. A few pages were sufficient to convince me that Andrews and Tyler occupy positions diametrically opposed to each other as to the character of the Bible and the significance of current events. Did I close the book and turn from it in disgust when I found that the position of the writer was wrong on almost every point discussed? No, indeed! My interest in the author and his work was, if possible, increased by this fact. The reading of the book became, in a sense and to a degree, a psychological study. I read every word of the more than three hundred and fifty pages with an almost eager interest. It is premillernial in its doctrine and thoroughly pessimistic in its spirit. Almost everything, with the possible exception of the Church of England, is bad and steadily growing worse. Nor is there any hope of a change until the Lord shall come in person and by his resistless might inaugurate a new social, moral and spiritual era. The gospel of Christ, I would say, if I accepted the position of this author, is a failure. The mission of the Son of God must also be regarded as a failure. Current events which are full of encouragement to you and me (I assume that you are in good health) fill the mind with dire forebodings. But the reading of even this book was a profitable exercise.

"Christianity in the Apostolic Age," by Geo. T. Purves, D. D., LL.D., recently Professor of New Testament Literature and Exeges is in Princeton Theological Seminary, now pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York—the late Dr. John Hall's church—is a scholarly, conservative, sweet-spirited book. You ought to read three books on "Christianity in the Apostolic Age" in close connection: the well-know and much discussed volume by Prof. A. C. Me Giffert, of the Union Theological Seminary a volume entitled "The Apostolic Age: It Life, Doctrine, Worship and Poli y," by Jame Vernon Bartlett, of Oxford; and this wor by Dr. Purves. The subject is approache by the distinguished gentlemen from thre different points. McGiffert, as you know, i radical almost to the point of recklessness in his destructive criticisms. Prof. Bartlet may be characterized as a moderate thinke of the modern school of higher criticism while Dr. Purves is almost, if not quite, a: extreme conservative on current critica questions. Read the books in the orde named, which, by the way, is the order of their appearance from the press, and I be lieve you will find the exercise profitable.

For some months I have been on the look out for leisure to read "Life Beyond Death," by Minot J. Savage, D. D. Dr. Savage i pastor of the Church of the Messiah, Dr Collyer's old congregation, in New York I read this book this week. The feature which impressed me from first to last wathe egotism of the author. He evidently thinks that he is one of the great men o this age. Dr. Savage's colossal egotism is refreshing. The note of dedication to his deceased son-Philip Henry Savage-is as sweet and pathetic a piece of writing as ever read. It is a literary gem. To read it brings tears to the eyes. The out of date ness of this up to-date thinker was the nex thing that impressed me. Again and again he fights a man of straw. He seems to suffer from a horrid nightmare when he thinks of Dante's and Milton's representa tions of purgatory and hell. It is al nost certain that no man who will read Dr Savage's book is in sympathy with the conceptions of Milton and Dante as to the nature of the punishment of the wicked; bu Savage seems not to be cognizant of th fact that the world—even the the logica world—has moved and is now moving Speaking of the punis ment of the wicked Dr. Savage says: 'If the doctrine of eterna punishment was clearly and unmistakal taught on every leaf of the Bible and on ever leaf of all the Bibles of all the world, I could not believe a word of it."

t believe a word of it."

There you have it; now be good!

A Hard Worker.

ONE OF THE "KINGS" OF THE COAST.

Mrs. L. S. King, of Concord, Cal., is state or ganizer and lecturer for the W. C. T. U. of California. She had been carrying on her work without using proper food to sustain her body, and says: "Before I found Grape Nuts Food I was suffering seriously with indigestion and my mind had become sluggish and dul, the memory being very much impaired.

"Hearing of Grape-Nuts as a food for rebuilding and strengthing the brain and nerve centers. I began its use. In two months I have gained four pounds in weight, never felt batter in my life, and find a most remarkable improvement in my memory and mental activity. In var stood the fatigue and pressure of work as well as I do now. A short time ago I went to a new county, worked twenty-two days, almost day and night, without rest, and cane home fe-ling fine. You may be sure I take Grape-Nuts Food with me so that I may depend upon having it."

Our Budget.

- -Virginia Convention at Richmond this week.
- -Georgia Convention at Augusta next week.
- -C. W. B. M Day is first Lord's day in December.
- -Glorious autumn this! Great time for Christian work. Forward, all along the line!
- -Look out for our Thanksgiving number. We hope to make it up to the best.
- —S:e splendid list of premium offers for CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST in this issue. Read it carefully.
- —During the year 1900, we have made a large increase in our circulation. But we expect to do much better for 1901.
- —Christian Pub. Co. has purchased the Central Christian Register, at Kansas City, Mo., and G. A. Hoffmann has been appointed editor and business manager of same.
- —Our neighbor, the Central Christian Advocate (Methodist), is moving this week to Kansas City following the star of empire. We wish it well in its new field. This leaves only three Protestant religious journals in St. Louis out of eight which were here a few years ago. The others have consolidated, died or removed. The Verdict of Time seems to be: fewer put better religious journals.
- —"Religion Straight from the Bible: A Plain and Sure Way to Become a Christian," is the title of a new tract we have issued from the pen of D. G. Porter, of Waterbury, Conn. The remarkable feature about the tract is that, while written by a member of the Baptist Church, and dealing with the question as to what one must do to be sure of salvation, it runs so parallel with the teaching of the Disciples on this subject that it might well be circulated in any of our protracted meetings, as an aid in evangelistic work. It covers 19 pages and can be had for 5 cents per copy, 40 cents per dozen, or $3 00 per hundred. Send for a single copy and examine it and then you may wish to order a supply.
- —We call attention to the Southwest Missouri Preachers' Institute and Springfield District Work, to be held at Aurora, Nov. 19-22. A very excellent program has been arranged, with a fine array of talent, a one and one-third rate has been accured for delegates, and the brethren in the southwestern part of the state should make it a great occasion. Let all the churches within that region be represented in that convention. It is not for preachers alone. D. W. Moore, of Springfield, is president of the District Co operation.
- -P.ctorial postal cards are a great fad in Europe. Every city, every point of interest, every society has them. The German Christian Endeavor Union has lately issued a Christian Endeavor postal card having the monogram of the society in gold on a purple ground.
- —Some time ago we referred to the probability that a book of selections from the Bible would be introduced in the Chicago Public Schools as supplementary readings. A committee of the School Board had so recommended, but the Board itself has voted down the recommendation.
- —Gove nor Stevens, of Missouri, closes his Thanksgiving proclamation with a well-chosen verse of Scripture. He says: "It will be well to remember the words of the prophet Nehemiah, spoken with reference to a thanksgiving day appointed more than twenty-three centuries ago: This day is holy unto the Lord your God; mourn not, nor weep; go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared; for this day is holy unto our Lord; neither be ye sorry, for the joy of the Lord is your strength."

- —We have received further reply from W. H. Winsor to the position of our English correspondent, but it has been crowded out by other matter until now it is rather out of date and we have his consent to withhold his article. This explanation, however, is due to Brother W. who writes in good spirit and whose article is unobjectionable save for the reason stated.
- —Rev. Charles M. Sheldon has been busy since his return from Europe writing a story which deals with the servant girl problem. Even those who have felt hitherto that this distinguished writer has missed the point in his studies of social needs will be prepared to admit that he is now grappling with the genuine problem in its fercest form. Dr. Sheldon will read his story to Boston audiences during December and soon after it will begin to appear serially in the Christian Eudeavor World.
- —Miss Lois Almira White was married on November 8 to Mr. Neil MacLeod at Stow, Ohio. Mr. MacLeod has been one of our missionaries in Jamaica and Miss White is known and loved wherever the C. W. B. M. is known. They will be at home after Nov. 30 at King's Gate, Jamaica.
- —The American Issue, the official organ of the anti-saloon league, becomes a weekly paper with the first number of its eighth volume. As a monthly it has done a good work and has maintained a good spirit. Friends of temperance may expect it to be an even more powerful instrument in the future.
- —S. M. Hunt, Missionary Secretary for New England, has compiled statistics showing the per capita contributions of the Disciples of Christ in various states for state missions. The figures as published in the New England Messenger show that the churches of New England head the list, with a contribution of $.44 for each member.
- —A debate was recently held between L. W. Spayd, of Shreve, Ohio, and E. C. Manville, of Sparta, Ohio, a First Day Adventist, on the proposition, "Resolved, That death is the cessation of being of the entire man—body, soul and spirit." The Shreve News is publishing the debate in its weekly issues, October, November and December.
- —The report of the Church Extension Board for October shows the total amount received during the month was $5,245.71, a gain over the corresponding month last year of $1,082.36. Remember the new watchword coined at the Kansas City Convention, "A half million for Caurch Extension by 1905." Churches that have not already taken the offering should do so at once and make remittance to G. W. Muckley, Corresponding S cretary, 600 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.
- —We are inreceipt of an invitation which reads as follows: "The ladies of the Bethany Auxi iary most cordially invite you to attend the twenty-first anniversary of their society and of the C. W. B. M. work in West Virginia, Sanday evening, Nov. 18, Christian Church, Bethany, West Virginia."
- —The Davis Street Christian Church of Ottumwa, Ia., held a rally recently, which is described as a grand success. It was a time of praise services, basket dinners, reports from all the departments of the church and helpful addresses. By the offerings of the day the church was put entirely out of debt.
- —All Indiana preachers are urged to send a card to Carlos C. Rowlison, 707 E. 13th Street, Indianspolis, Indiana, stating that they will attend a meeting for prayer and conference on Nov. 20, 21, in behalf of a Twentieth Century Movement and that they will come to the city the forenoon of the 20th. This statement will provide for them entertainment for the two days. For further particulars see last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Salt Rheum

It may become chronic.

It may cover the body with large, inflamed, burning, itching, scaling patches and cause intense suffering. It has been known to do so.

Do not delay treatment.

Thoroughly cleanse the system of the humors on which this ailment depends and prevent their return.

The medicine taken by Mrs. Ida E. Ward. Cove Point, Md., was Hood's Sarsaparilla. She writes: "I had a disagreeable itching on my arms which I concluded was salt rheum. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla and in two days felt better. It was not long before I was cured, and I have never had any skin disease since."

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Promises to cure and keeps the promise. It is positively unequaled for all cutaneous eruptions. Take it.

- —The Central church, of Lexington, Ky., is making an heroic struggle to wipe out the debt which rests upon their church building. They expect to ac on plish much of this task before Thanksgiving day, and have a Thanksgiving service which will be a real Thanksgiving service.
- —G. W. Hall, of Ellendale, N. D., has prepared an excellent pamphlet of 46 mag s on "The Model Conversions, Harmonized and Unitized," which, with the chart it contains, will go far toward straight ening out any one who has a confused view of the process of conversion.

Invitations have been issued to the dedication of the new church at Delta, Is., on December 2. The new house is said to be a handsome building and a decided in provement to the town. It is furnished in oak, seated with opera chairs, lighted with ace ylere and heated with a furnace. W. F. Fisher is the efficient pastor of this congregation.

- —The C. W. B. M. auxiliary, of Fairbury, Neb., goes at its work with an intelligent zeal which is worthy of imitation. Mrs. Oesbgar, vice-president of the State Board, sends us an account of their plans for the year. The president appoints the leaders for the year in advance, who, with her, prepare the programs. Two hostesses are appointed for each meeting to act as a social committee. There is a map drill each month for education in the work of the C. W. B. M., and a review of the most important articles in the Tidings. Five cents a month per member is paid to the State Board. They support an orphan in India, and do their share in helping Nebraska to support one of the new missionaries for India.
- —The annual report of the Board of Church Extension has been mailed to all the preachers and churches this week. This report is very interesting. It is decidedly the best in the history of Church Extension. There are twenty one pages taken in the publication of receipts. There is an especially interesting table of churches that reached their apportionments, and another table which is very valuable, indicating the loans that have been made since the beginning, with those that have been paid out.

This report can be obtained free, by mailing a postal card to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Special dispatch to the Christian-Evangelist.

CINCINNATI, O., Nov. 12.

Received ten thousand dollars this morning on F. M. RAINS. the annuity plan.

-Mr. H. L. Atkinson, of the University of Chicago, is the one who will receive the $150 lot offered for a suitable name for the new resort on the Delaware Coast, he having been the first one of four persons to send in the name "Bethany Beach." The committee selected to choose a name from the larg + list sent in, was composed of the following well known men of Scranton, Pa .: M. H. Holgate, Real Estate and Loans, D B Atherton, Secretary of Board of Trade, George Howell, Superintendent of Public Schools.

The Annual Report of t'e Foreign Society has been published. It contains the minutes of the convention at Kansas City, the annual report, a list of the missionaries and their addresses, the names and addresses of the Life Directors and Life Members and the entire receipts for the year. This is a very valuable document. Those who receive copies should keep them for ref rence. Any one who has not received a copy can get one by sending a card to F. M. Rains, Cor. Sec'y., Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

We regret the interruption that has occurred in the publication of the letters of travel by Charles Reign Scoville. The irregularities of European mail service are doubtless to blame, for only the first, third and sixth of the series have reached us. We await the second.

Dersonal Mention.

- J. E. Hawes, of Ada. O. may be engaged for one meeting before Dec. 20.
- C. G. McN-ill, of 670 33d St., Milwaukee, Wis., has not located yet, and is willing to hold one or two meetings.

George Darsie, of Frankfort, Ky., began a meeting with the Broadway Christian Church, Lexington, on Manday of this week.

- R. A. Omer, of Comp Point, I'l., is now in a meeting at Albany, Mo. His next meeting is at Lexington, Ky.
- C. M. Fillmore is giving a series of Sunday night seemens on familiar old texts and historic sketches of favorite old hymns at Carthage, O.

By an error we announced that J. P. Davis, of Fairbury, N.b., could be engaged for meetings during the fall and winter. He is at Fairfild, Neb.

Singing evangelist A. O. Hunsaker will return to the field at once. Presors or evangulists desiring the services of a singer may address him at Liberty, Ill. He has had six years' experience.

- J. W. Lowber is delivering a series of chapel addresses in the auditorium of the University of Texas on "The Most Dangerous Tendencies of the Present Age."
- W. J. Lhamon's evening sermons preached in his church in Allegheny, Pa. are printed, somewhat condensed, in the local church paper. They are worth it.

Following the dedication of the new church at Cameron by H. O Breed n, Nov. 25, O D. Maple, the pastor, will give a c urse of six chart lectures which will be the prelude to a protracted meeting.

- F. C. Wing goes from Coats Grove, Mich., to The church at the former place have Alanoe given official expression of their esteem for Bro.
 Wing and their regret for his departure.
- Failde, of Sidell, Ill., reports that the church there has paid $225 to missions and India sufferers during the past year. Bro. Faulder obeyed the Lord in baptism on Nov. 4.
- A. M. Harral leaves the church at Farmington, Mo, with a new church nearly built and paid for, and has begun at Chandler, Okla., where he reports one addition at the first service and a promising outlook

- W. W. Weedon is beginning his third year at William-ville, Iil. The church there raised its apportionment for State Missions—as we would of course expect in the church of the state chair-
- H. A. Easton, singing evangelist, is in a meeting at Champaign, Ill., assisting the pastor, W. P. Shamhart. They have prospects for a successful Shamhart. They have prospects for a successful meeting. Bro. Easton would like to engage for January either with pastors or evangelists. Permanent address, Danville, I.l., Route 2.
- T. E Cramblett, of Pittsburg, Pa., will personally conduct a party on a "comprehensive p lgrimage through Europe and the Orient" in ninety days, starting from New York Feb. 23. dozen of our preachers are already booked for the party Others who wish to j in may secure in formation by addressing Bro. Cramblett as above.

Evangelist Samuel Gregg has been elected corresponding secretary for the seventh Nebraska district. Ia this district are several fields where consecrated young men can find planty of opportunity to labor for the Master and build up a good work Small salaries only can be paid at first, but they will be enlarged according to the ability of the preacher. Write Bro. Gregg, with reference, at Harvard, Neb.

- H. J. Hostetter, of St. Joseph, Ill., reports that his work is progressing as it ought, that his church has rais d its apportionment for Church Extension and Illi ois day; that it has entertained the annual county meeting and (serhaps as a result) has been compelled to put a new roof on the building; that J. Fred Jones preached for them a week with excelle t results; and that the pastor himself (having survived a first) has been the victim of a second surprise and donation party.
- J. A Largston, late of Oswego, Kan., called at this office recently on his way home from an ex-tensive trip in Europe. He traveled alone and he has a cyclometer to prove that he cycled over 3,700 miles These two fac s account for his knowing more about the countries through which he has passed than most travelers do It was a pl-asure to swap stories with him about bicycling in the Alps and Apennines. He is going back to south-eastern Kansas where he formerly labored.

A special dispetch to the St Louis Globe Demo-"Rev. J. H. Gilliland, pastor of the crat says: First Christian church of Bloomington, at the morning services to day announced to his congregation that his work as paster would close Feb. 1, and asked the church to govern itself accordingly. Mr Gibiland has been pastor of this church since 1888, and his ministry has been remarkably successful in all respects. The congregation during his pastorate has grown from 300 to above 1,000. Mr. Gilliland some time ago concluded that the time had arrived when a second congregation should be established in this city, with a church in the southern p rt of town. He conferred with the trust es, but being unable to convince them that such division was necessary, has decided to resign the pastorate."

Errett Gates.

Mr. Errett Gates, whose picture appears on our front page this week, is one of the coming men of the younger generation. Inde-d, he is more than a coming man; he has already arrived. Following his college course at Ada, O., Mr. Gates took the full theological course in Union Theological Seminary in New York City. He succeeded W. J. Russell as pastor of the large and prosperous congregation at Grand Rapids, Mich., and occupied that post acceptably for several years. About three years ago he came to Chicago, first as pastor of the Hyde Park Church, then as instructor in the Disciples' Divinity House and financial secretary of the same. He is doing good work in his effort to secure endowment for the Divinity House and we bespeak for him a cordial reception by the brethren to whom he may come. The triumvirate which is now in charge of the Divinity House, Gates, Ames and Willett, are men well known and worthy of all confidence.

West Side, Chicago.

The West Side Church, Chicago, gratefully witnessed the dedication of its new church building, Lord's day, Nov. 4. The day was beautiful, the services delightful and the audiences immense. Z. T. Sweeney preached an excellent discourse on the "Power of the Gospel" in the morning, and then raised $4,300 in subscriptions, which were increased in the evening to $5,700, making within a year since building commenced $14,000 subscribed for the upper structure, the basement having been erected some years ago.

At 3 P. M. a Union Communion Service of the Chicago churches was held, many from cities participating. The exercises other were very impressive. The invocation was by G. C. Kindred, Scripture reading by Hugh Morrison, prayer by E. S. Ames. Professor Willett delivered an interesting address on "What Meaneth These Stones," after which W. B. Taylor nd George A. Ragan presided at the communion able. George E. Campbell pronounced the bene liction.

In the evening Z. T. Sweeney delivered a powerul sermon on "God Spake by His Son." A large horus choir under the leadership of H. P. Bulkley ontributed excellent music. About 1,200 people ttended each service. The building and ground ost in the neighborhood of $40,000. E W. teynolds, Dr. P. C. Midison, S. J. Chapman, J. W. wafford and N. J. Relph are credited with the nain share in the erection of the new building. With the trinity: A splendid building, a faithful ninister, John W. Allen, and a united membership, he church is thrice blessed.

EDWIN STEWART.

Church Re-opening at Augusta, Ga.

The First Christian Church at Augusta, Ga., A. B. Phillips pastor, has been closed during the ummer months for improvements. The re-open agocurred on Lord's day, the 21st ult. The augusta Caronicle contains a full account of the moreovements made in the church under the nergetic leadership of the pastor, and of the nion services on the night of the re-opening. The following description of the improvements hade in the church is from that paper.

A partition was run across the church in front of the former rostrum, and in the center of this here is a beautifully proportioned arch. In the ecess spanned by this arch is placed the organ and choir above the back of the pulpit, and partitioned off by ornamental panel work surmounted by a brass rod extending across. The form rorgan gallery on the side of the church was taken out and double doors were placed there eading a ross a vestibule into the lecture room. By throwing open these doors and the doors to be lecture room, much additional seating space added, as persons in the lecture room have a riew of the rostrum and can hear as well as in the main auditorium

The bap istry, which was formerly behind the pulpit, where the organ now is, was transferred to the lecture room, and immersions will in luture take place at the prayer-me-ting service on Wednesdar night Both the church and ecture room have been painted throughout, wood work, do rs, walls and ceiling. The ceiling in the church was very high and was of natural pine. This had grown dark with age, and the appearance was heavy and gloomy. The ceiling has been painted light blue and the rafters old ivory, and the wall and woodwork a light color, so that the brightness of the auditorium has been greatly enhanced.

But the most gratifying effect of the changes is in the better proportions of the room and the improved accustic qualities. The church no longer looks long and narrow, but is apparently wider and symmetrical. The organ and choir are heard to much better effect in their new position, and the scho which worried a speaker and congregation seems to have been cured. The members of the church are delighted with the changes that have been made, and there were many expressions of compliment and approval from the large audience at the re-opening services last night.

While the church was closed Bro. Phillips has occupi d the pulpits of the Baptist Methodist and Presbyterian churches several times in the absence of their pastors, who had left on their vacations earlier than he. As a matter of Chris tian reciprocity, they adjourned their mestings on the night of the re-opening and participated in the exercises of the evening. Addresses were made by J. S. Lamar, on "The Church;" by Dr. Kendall, on "The Church Temporal;" by Rev. Mr. Melton, on "The Intellectual" and by Dr Plankett, on "The Spiritual Church;" Mr. Phillips closing with a few felicitous remarks. The occasion was a very profitable one and the church building is said to be vastly improved in convenience and beauty by the changes made. Great credit is given by the Chronicle to Bro. Philips for his part in bringing about these desirable improvements, both in securing the mofley and superintending the work.

Are Your Kidneys Weak?

Weak or Diseased Kidneys Poison the Blood, Break Down the Entire System and Bring on Bright's Disease.

To Prove what the Great Kidney Remedy, Swamp-Root, Will do for YOU, all our Readers May Have a Sample Bottle Sent Absolutely Free by Mail.

You know what happens to a sewer when it becomes clogged, don't you?

Do you know what happens to the human system when the kilneys become clogged? They are unable to throw out the impurities from the blood and become infected with poisons; they decay, fall apart and pass out in the urine; the blood, unfiltered, carries the pilson all over the system, and if not checked death follows. The kidneys are the sewers of the human system.

LABORATORY WHERE SWAMP-ROOT, THE WORLD-FAMOUS K.DNEY REMEDY, IS PREPARED.

When your kidneys are not doing their work, some of the symptoms which prove it to you are pain or dull ache in the back, excess of uric acid, gravel, rheumatic pains, sediment in the urine, scanty supply, scalding irritation in passing it, obliged to go often during the day and to get up many times during the night to empty the bladder; sleeplessness, nervous irritability, dizziness, irregular heart, breathlessness, sallow, unhealthy complexion, paffy or dark ircles under the eyes; sometimes the feet, limbs or body bloat, loss of ambition, general weakness and debility.

When you are sick, then, no matter what you think the name of your disease is, the first thing you should do is to afford aid to your kidneys by using Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy.

In taking Swamp-Root you afford natural help to Nature, for Swamp-Root is the most perfect healer and gentle aid to the kidneys that is known to medical science.

Perhaps you are in doubt about your kidneys and want to find out. Here is a simple test. Take from your urine passed when you arise in the morning about two ounces, place in a glass or bottle and let it stand for twenty-four hours. If upon examination you find any settlings or sediment, if it is milky or cloudy, or if particles float about in it, disease has gotten a foothold in your kidneys and Nature is calling for help.

If you have the slightest symptoms of kidney or bladder trouble, or if there is a trace of it in your family history, you would profit by taking Swamp-Root every now and then as a preventative, and this absolutely forestall kidney and bladder troubles.

The fam us new discovery, Swamp-Root, has been tested in so many ways, in nospital work, in private practice, among the helpless too poor to purchase relief, and has proved so successful in every case, that a special arrangement has been made with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST by which all of its readers who have not already tried it, may have a sample bottle sent absolutely free by mail; also a book telling all about kidney and bladder discases, and containing some of the thousands of testimonial letters from men and women reclaimed to lives of happiness and usefulness by the means of Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy.

Swamp-R ot is pleasant to take and is so remarkably successful that our readers are advised to write for a free sample bottle, and to be sure and state that they read this generous offer in the St. Louis Christian-Evangelist when sending your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

If you are already convinced that Swamp-

The Work of the Disciples' Divinity House.

With the opening of the autu an quarter, Oct. 1, sevaral new names were added to the list of students in the Divinity School. Our 'young men continue to come with persistent regularity. Many times the number would come if the House could hold out any hopes of employment to provide means of subsistence. We are receiving inquiries every week from young men who are anxious to come, but who have no means of support. The best we can do is to assure them of a scholarship covering the cost of tuition, so that they have no expanse on that ground. The Baptist 'heologi: al Union, however, is enabled to provide Baptist young men with partial support, and the assurance of employment in churches and missions to secure the balance.

The Disciples could have as many young men here as the Baptists if they could offer even a partial support by way of employment.

Hemey, H. E. Luck, J. P. Givens. Most of these mon are serving churches or missions in and around Chicago. Dr. Herbert L. Willett is conducting a weekly lecture assembly. The Disciples at the University hold their first monthly banquet next Monday night. This is to be a regular monthly social gathering.

During the journey of the writer among the Disciples of the West, he found strange misconceptions of the purpose and nature of the Divinity House. The most common misconception was the confusion of the Divinity House with the "Bible Chair" movement. The purpose of the Divinity House is specifically for the more complete training of ministers and missionaries; that of the Bible Chair is for the instruction of college students. The Divinity House gives special ministerial instruction, the Bible Chair general religious instruction. The Divinity House is an organic part of the university, the Bible Chair has no relation but that of proximity to a university.

Notes and News.

The Land of Evangeline.

When I was in the country of Rob Roy in the Highlands of Scotland the beautiful little boat that carried us over Loch Katrine was named "Rob Roy," and when we landed at Digby, in New Scotland, the engine "Evangeline" came to the wharf to take us to the station. We left Digby at 1 P. M., and all the afternoon feasted our eves upon as fine a country as I have ever seen. The Aunapolis and Cornwallis valleys are hard to excel either in beauty or fertility, and the ground is richly bistoric. We passed through the village of Grand Pre, and saw the old well and ancient trees about the traditional home of Evangeline; and the Basin of Minas, where the English ships stood at anchor and whence they conveyed away the sorrowing Acadians, is in full view from the Dominion Atlantic Railroad. "The forests primeval" are gone, but the "deep-voiced neighboring ocean" still "speaks from its rocky caverns," and "on the shores of the Basin of Minas, distant, secluded, still, the little village of Grand Pre lies in the fruitful valley."

But it is another village now. Few traces of the ancient town remain. With its old denizens it is little more than a memory now. It is said that Longfellow never saw the land that he so faithfully and graphically portrayed. I have read his sai poem with a rew interest since I have been on the ground. But the people here do not like this poem. They thick that it does the English injustice, and that its narrative is more imagination than reality. The substantial people living in the Cornwallis valley have little appreciation of the poetic value of the country.

At 9 P. M. we reached Halifax, and were met at the station by the pastor and some of the brethren and I was taken to a hospitable home. This being my first visit to Halifax in the New World, it is one of much interest. Let me assure you that it is not a hot place at all, but most of the time since arriving here I have been uncomfortably cool, my winter overcoat being often in requisition. The site of the city is most beautiful, and its harbor is one of the finest in the world. There are many interesting old buildi: gs here, the parks and gardens are fine, and many of the churches are spacious and imposing; but the main part of the residence district is treeless and unattractive. The Admiralty interests are extensive. Barracks, armories, forts, men-of-war, and the citadel form no small part of the city. Everywhere the redcoats are in evidence, and the people are very loyal to the mother country. But the people generally feel very kindly toward the United States, and let us hope that the growing friendship between the two great English speaking countries in the world will never be interrupted by unthoughtful partisans upon either side.

Halifax has always been a difficult field for our religious work. Successive attempts have been made for nearly half a century to plant the cause of primitive Christianity in this city. But what with poverty, removals and mistakes, and the unfriendly attitude of the older churches, little progress has been made. We now have a neat house of 250 seating capacity, well located in the north part of the city, and upon which there is but a small debt. We have 50 members, as consecrated and li eral a people as I have ever seen. There is not a g-ambler, or crank or kicker among them. Bro. E. C Ford is the pastor, -one of the most experienced and efficient men in the provinces. The greatest difficulty that confronts them is the constant removal of our members from the city. Daring the last two years one-half of the members have gone away and unless this obbing tide shall return, or at least be stayed, it will be only a short time till the church will be stranded. But let us hope for a flow of the tide and a refilling of the church.

Those who think that the bitter opposition of the denominations is over should accompany the evangelist into places where our cause is weak. We have tried to preach the truth in love here, and yet everything that sectarian hate and bigotry could do has been done to hinder the people from coming to our meetings. The press is so under the influence of sectarianism that the leading daily refused to publish some sta istics about our people when our pastor offered to pay for its insertion. When one of members said that we numbered 1,200,000, a man who works for one of the daily papers declared that he knew the facts in the case and that we did not have twelve thousand members in the world!

We should have a four months' meeting instead of four weeks, but we are sowing the seed, and our faithful pastor will gather in the crop in after days.

Hawkeye Items.

Des Moines is the "Hub" of the Iowa "Universe" and our Iowa "Jerusalem." Drake University must be mentioned first. It is forging ahead of its usual record of growth. The present enrollment is about 800— a gain of 100 over this time in any previous year. All departments have gained, especially the Bible department, which enrolls 90; about half of whom are preaching. Dean Haggard's fresh European experiences, and the strong reinforcement in Prof Clieton Lockhart, who has introduced some original work in Hebrew, are glving unusual interest to this department, which means so much to our brotherhood.

Bro. Breeden has spent the summer at home. He has started a new mission on the South side, bought and paid for a house for its use—our tenth house of worship in the city—and is about to begin a series of meetings in it himself. He is feeling keenly the loss, by removal, of several of their strongest members and heaviest payers. The Central has always been a munificent giver—of money and members—and has richly experienced the promised blessing.

The University Church has done remarkably well in the absence of its pastor. The whole city and brotherhood has lately shared in its solicitude on account of Bro. McCash's serious illness in London. The latest report from him is, "improving rapidly" The attendance at the University Sunday-school on the recent "rally day" was 1047 and the regular attendance last Lord's day 768.

The East Side Church, for some time without a pastor, has secured Bro. E. W. Brickert from Sullivan, Ill., and is starting very enthusiastically for new conquests under his leadership.

Our little congregation at Valley Junction, a very important railroad suburb, has commenced the erection of a new $3,000 house; the only way to keep pace with the growth of the place. E. J. Wright, formerly of Hannibal, Mo., is doing faithful and fruitful work there.

We are well abreast of the other churches at Highland Park, the seat of Highland Park Normal College, with a very large number of students. Clark Bower is leading and constantly growing in favor.

T. T. Thompson, pastor at Ninth and Shaw, attended the Kansas City Convention and is doing his best to unload it upon his people. They are improving and beautifying their house.

Grant Park, in a rapidly growing suburb in close proximity to the state fair grounds, is taking on new life under the ministry of M. M. Nelson, who has just entered Drake University from Colorado.

At Chesterfield, a manufacturing suburb, we have a very convenient house for the institutional work which the Central people propose to inaugurate there this fall.

Park Avenue has secured the services of Prof. Sherman Kirk, a good preacher and a good church of very substantial people, in a southern suburb, where we have about all the e is.

These aggregate about 3,800 members and each has a good list of CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST readers, so it may be expected that they will thrive.

RAMBLER.

Ocean View, Delaware.

The brethren at Ocean View, Delaware, are building a new edifice. Not only are they doing this, but with only 60 members they support a minister all his time and contribute to our missionary enterprises. Bro. Jacob Walters is their pastor and it is safe to say no man is making greater sacrifices than he. This brother, with a wife to support, receives less than $225. He is not a young man either and by no means a careless or indifferent preacher.

Ocean View is within one and a half miles of the new summer ocean resort for the Disciples of Christ. We are receiving letters of inquiry from all parts of the country. Many are purchasing lots, which at the present time are very low in price. Cottages can be erected for a mere nominal sum. Here is an ideal spot for our brethren to spend their summer vacation. Ocean breezes, ocean baths and gospel sermons will be a fine tonic for weary men and women. A committee on program was appointed by the late convention of the Disciples of Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia. Bro. F. D. Power, of Washington, is the chairman. If any of our brethren are in the habit of going to Atlantic City, Ocean Grove or other famous ocean resorts, I wish they would write me for fuller information concerning this matter. We intend to make this resort an ocean Mecca for our brotherhood. Address all communications to me at Millville, Del.

Bad Dreams

CAUSED BY COFFEE.

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing nightmare.

"Finally, after hearing the exp-rience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and gone to drinking Postum Food Coffee, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum Food Coffee and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavor and taste. It entirely took the place of coffee, and to my very great satisfaction, I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could warn every man, woman and child from the unwholesome drug, ordinary coffee.

"People really do not appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what a terrible effect it has on the human system. If they did, hardly a pound of it would be sold. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hard in a fire after I had once been burned.

"A young lady friend of ours, Miss Emily Pierson, had stomach trouble for a long time, and could not get well as long as she used coffee. She finally quit coffee and began the use of Postum Food Coffee and is now perfectly well. Yours for health. Don't publish my name." ——Herington, Kan. Minnesota Letter.

Among Minnesota's population of two millions there are about 3,000 Disciples of Christ, distributed among about 40 churches. For over 20 years we have been 40 churches and 3,000 people. Yet we have been growing during all that time. Statistics show that, as compared with other religious bodies, our percentage of converts has always been the largest-and also that our percentage of removals is nearly always the largest. During the past 20 years there have probably been 4,000 people added to our Minnesota churches, and just about the same number have moved on west or back east and are now serving in other states. Why is this? Well, our converts are mostly Americans, and are also mostly country people. This state has been so crowded with European people that thousands of American families, especially of farmers, have left the state in search of an English-speaking settlement. Forty per cent. of our population is foreign-born. Minnesota is almost like Europe for our cause. Take Mankato as a sample of our cities. It has a population of 12,000, with 21 churches, in 11 of which the preaching is always in a foreign language. Then, too, the Dakotas have been enticing our people away with all the allurements of a new country. For 20 years we have been starting churches in the Dakotas. We are a missionary people, and give more per capita than any other like number of our people.

Those 40 churches, with two or three exceptions, are weak, strugging churches. Most of them have kept up the struggle for 20 or 30 years and, though they have converted many people, are yet weak churches, numerically and financially. In faith, patience, courage and depth of conviction, they are like unto the fathers. They know how to stand alone, to be little, insignificant churches in the midst of a community, to suffer as Christians only, to brave misrepresentation and scoffs, to fight for recognition. They are strangers to our prominent men, to great conventions and popular churches.

Imagine, then, the anticipations of our Minnesota people when they learned that the National conventions of our people are to be held in Minneapolis next year. It will be a great event for the cause in the northwest. A large percentage of the Minnesota, Dakota and Wisconsin brethren will be there, and when they behold the banner which they have been accustomed to associate with meagre numbers and struggling bands waving in triumph over a mighty host, they will thank God and take new courage.

And the brethren from the states where our churches are many and strong will find in the brethren of the corthwest a spirit of loyalty, enterprise, devotion and liberality worthy the imitation of their home churches. Come up, brethren, next year. Teach us that great conquests of the world are possible, and let us teach you patient endurance in a righteous cause in spite of great discouragements.

The meeting which J. A. S. Romig recently closed with the church in St. Paul, I learn was a great blessing to that church, though the additions were only 25, not so many as some people had hoped for. A. D. Harmon the pastor, will make the most of the evangelist's work.

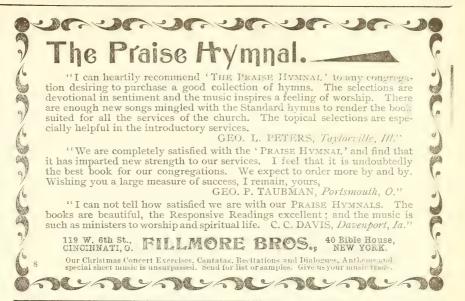

M Doneld and Kerr, evangelists, are in a meeting at Amboy where they hope to start a church. I hear they are meeting with good success.

Next Lord's Day, C. J. Fanner, pastor at Minneapolis, will begin revival services.

The Christian Home.

Bros. Hall, Breeden and Martin's mention of the efforts to establish a Christian Home has called out so many inquiries, I think that an explanatory word at this time from my pen in regard to it is needful. The Home, as now planned in the minds of the promoters, is to be a place where our own and other Christian people can stop when in the city; a place where every accommodation now found in the city hotels will be furnished at reasonable rates, and where, too, Christian people will be the guests, thus creating an agreeable company; where there will be no objectionable characters, games or amusements, but where all things will be in keeping with Christian ideas. The home will be furnished with a library and reading-rooms, where there will ever be on hand a good supply of our own literature. The money accruing from the board of these Christian guests, over and above the actual cost, will be used in a free sanitarium. It will be a place where, as far as our means will permit, all worthy destitutes who are Christians will be cared for until able to care for themselves or return home.

Such a home would be crowded with grateful guests who would gladly avail themselves of its pleasant surroundings. The need of the home can not be told in a letter, but may be illustrated by the Pythian Sauitarium. The K. of Ps. in their grand lodges have voted to build a $500,000 sanitarium here. "Do they really need it?" To be sure. If not, a body of wise and capable business men, such as compose that body, never would have voted this expense. Where do they need it? Here. What for? To care for K. of Ps. and carry out the noble principles of that order.

Do you know, brethren, our membership is twice as large as theirs? That means that the Disciples need a home twice as bad, and twice as large, to care equally well for their needy brothers. They are building that they may serve humanity. Shall we let our poor and homeless, sick and destitute, walk the streets or sleep on the mountain side or go to the poor-house, while the doors of a $500,000 Pythian sanitarium open to welcome their needy? Is it better to be a Pythian than a Disciple of the Lord Jesus Christ? Shall the lodge do more for humanity than the Church? It is our shame that we have to contemplate but a $75,000 Home-but it will be a greater shame to refuse the means altogether, and leave our poor homeless invalids to beg in the future as in the past. If we do this, we can not be the Church of Christ, for we do not have the spirit of Christ.

The Home will be under the management of seven wise Christian business men who form the Board of Trustees. I have been asked if we are in need of means or ready to receive money. Yes. There is no small expense in starting a work of this sort. Others have asked: "Are you going to stay there?" "What assurance have we that you will not start the work and then leave and it might fall through?" I have bought a home here. The brethren are with me. The Church is a unit. Success has been had in the past, and God is with us, and no work depends on the efforts of one man. Have no fears if you wish to assist.

Disciples In Yale.

Yale starts off with about 2,800 students. The Disciples of Christ are well represented here this year. There are five in the Divinity School, two in the Academic Department and perhaps others with whom we have not as yet become acquainted. Those in attendance are Mr. C. P. Leach from Drake, Messrs W. L. Fisher, P. B. Cochran and F. L. Stottlemeyer from Bethany and Messrs Howard Woodward and G. H. Couch from Hiram.

The professors have become acquainted with our colleges and give full credit for all work done. Especially does o'd Bethany rank well in Yale. After graduating such Bethany men as Pres. B. A. Jenkins, Professors H. L. Willett and W. E. Garrison, they are glad to welcome all who have tasted of Bethany's goodness. The Disciples of Christ are every year sending more and more men eastward beyond the Alleghenies. There seems to be an atmosphere of greatness in these New England Universities. After having studied such books as Fisher's Church Histories, Stevens' books on Theology, Ladd's Psychology, Adam's Histories, it is a rare privilege to sit at the feet of these authors and meet them face to face.

One of the best features of Yale outside of the lecture room is the systematic Christian work. Nearly every student in the Divinity School and many others are actively engaged in teaching Sunday-school classes, conducting courses in mission study, assisting in social settlements and missions, aiding in hospital and jail work, and preaching for churches in and out of the city. The work is carried on in a very systematic way, having a general chairman and a committee for each division of the work.

We have on our table the Christian-EvangelIST, the Christian Statdard and Christian Century, which are most highly enjoyed by all of us, and especially because we do not have the privilege of attending the Church of Christ. We have no churches closer than New York City except a small, disorganized congregation in Bridgeport, which we hope to be able to strengthen before leaving here.

Washington State Convention.

The Washington State Convention completed its best session in Tacoma, Oct. 13, The C. W. B. M., met on the 11th and had a splendid convention, my wife presiding. Miss Wilcox, of Ballard, preached for the ladies Thursday and gave them a fine sermon. Friday morning opened with the report of the State Evangelist, and reports from the churches. On misrionary days we were treated to addresses by J. N. Smith, of New Whatcom, on Home Day; D. B. Garrison, Olympia, Foreign Day; A. C. Vail, Seattle Church Extension; John Young, Everett, Forefathers' Day, and J. T. Eshelman, Tacoma, Ministerial Relief. These addresses were all strong, sw-et-spirited, earnest and effective. They were followed by Neal S. McCallum from Indiana, now of this state, in an eloquent appeal for State Work. Bro. McCallam has determined to remain in Washington. "The Advantages of the Latest and Best Translation of the Biolo" was instructively handled by W. P. Caldwell, of Deer

Bro. Wm. S. Cowden delivered a masterly address on the "Care of all the Churches." In the evening W. S. Crockett, of Nor h Yakima, gave us "The Aggressiveness of Christianity." It was full of seed th ughts and was a plea strong and earnest for the "old guide book." Saturday opened with a symposium on Sunday-school Work led by King Pendleton, of Tacoma. His address was a gem in its sparkling beauty and a steam engine in force and power. His theme was "The Scope of Sundayschool Work." I followed on "The Superintendent and the Management of Schools." Dudley Eshelman, of Tacoma, treated of "How to Interest Classes and Get Them to Study." Rev W C. Merritt, of Tacoma (Congregationalist), and Union S. S. Evangelist for Washington, emphasized the "Opportunities of Bailding the Church of Christ through the Sunday-school." In the afternoon David Husband -a late-comer to the state-made two addresses: one on the "Endeavor in the Church" and the other on the "Morning Service as a Combined Preaching and Sunday-school Service." This was the most striking address of the convention. Bro. Husband makes the entire church a Sunday school. He must be prevailed upon to give his ideas on the subject again to the church through our papers. He is now at Waitsburg.

Bro. E C. Wigmore preached Saturday night. His theme was the "Duty of Briogi g our Best to the Lord's Work" It was a great sermon.

The following board was elected f r this year: J. S McCallum Olympia, president; King Pendleton, Tacoma, West Side, and E C. Wigmore, East Side, vice-presidents; Dudley Eshelman, Tacoma, recording secretary; C. O. Curry, treasurer and D. B. Garrison corresponding secretary, both of Olympia.

Sunday many Taco na pulpits were filled by our preachers and communion services conducted by Bros. Cowden and Husband at the First Church at 3 o'clock. It was a great convention. We met with the First Church, Tacoma, but the Central was present in force and helped in the splendid entertainment, D. B. GARRISON, Cor. Sec'y.

Dedication at Homer, Indiana.

The church at Homer, Indiana, has just completed a new and commodious house of worship. Homer is in Bush County, one of the richest counties in Indiana. Many of the older prea hers among the Disciples have preached there. It was in the church at Homer that Bro. Knowles Shaw confessed his faith in Christ. For several years Bro. James W. Connor has preached for this church, and he is justly held in the highest esteem both by the church and the community. Lord's day, Nov. 4, was the day selected for the dedication of the new house. The other churches had kindly given up their services and, sith their pastors, attended our service. We preached as best we could, then asked for money to provide for all debts against the building, and to the delight of all enough was raised so that the house was offered to the Lord with all indebtedness provided for.

Notes from Northwestern Indiana.

We are now preaching regularly for the church at Valparaiso, as Bro. Brands and party will not return from the East before December. Betweentimes we are closing up our district work and by January 1st will either accept pastoral work again or evangelize indep ndently.

Mrs Brandt leaves November 3d to join her husband in London, Mrs. Bogart and Mrs Lowenstine accompany her. They will visit Scotland, France and Germany.

B. C. Black has taken the work at Lowell. Milo W. Nethercult is pushing the work at Hammond. Louis R. Hotalling closed his two years' labor with the church at Kentland. George Watkins is making a fine record at Morosco. Mrs. Watkins is teaching in the public schools.

The church at West-ille will soon call a pastor. Grant E. Pike held a good meeting at Boone Grove. The writer assisted tim the second week. He expects to hold a revival at Hebron after the election.

Melnotte Miller has been holding a good meeting at Ge dale, in Jasper County.

We close our work in this missionary district with many regrets. During the twenty-two months we were actively engag d in this work, we experienced many hardships, and had many seasons of rejoicing. We have been the humble instrument under God of doing much good. During the past two years I have seen many things that have served to open my eyes to human weakness. If the cause we all love shall ever prosper in Indiana, somebody must tell the truth. We have been at temp ing to bring about co-operation-and this is the only salvation for these church s-by getting together occasionally, and having no success to report, we have wasted the time in exchanging com pliments. We submit that the time has come when something else is in order. Let the churches join hands in this great work. There is no end to the work needed in the mission fi-lds of Indiana. We close our work because, the churches will not support us. We have done the bardest year's work we have ever done. Have preached on an average of one sermon for each day, since January 1, served two churches, and, through the grace of God, added nearly 200 to the sav-d, notwithstanding the fact that nearly all the work done this year has been mission work. Not ten churches in the district have done anything to help it along. May God add his blessing, that the seed sown with tears may enable some one to reap with joy. Valparaiso, Oct. 26, 1900. T. J. Missouri Mission Notes.

The minutes of the State Convention have at last been gotten into the mails, the General Convention being here made is impossible to get this done sooner. This is the last issue of the Christian Mi-sionary Magazine for this year, the next will be the January numb r, but will be out December 1. This is the Official List number. All our preachers in this state must get their names and addresses in this list, or else be put to a world of trouble concerning their permits. Each one will receive a notice to this effect this next week. Be sure and give it immediate attention. You an't afford to neglect it.

The motto for this year is: "Ten thousand dolars for State Missions and ten thousand souls for Jesus." We can realize these things only by the nearty co-operation of all the churches and all the preachers in the state.

It is a good thing to begin now. Sunday before Thanksgiving day is "Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America." We have been e usating our chil-Iren concerning the heathen in other lands, while we have failed to arouse their sympathies for those on our own shores. It is high time we changed

It was the delight of your secretary to spend ast Lord's day in St. Louis, preaching at Beulah n the morning and West End at night. I was deighted with all that I aw at each place. Bro. W. A. Moore, the pastor at B-ulah, seems to be filling the place well. He is full of aggressive force and t the church will follow his lead it must grow. The audience at night was a happy surprise. It vas as dark as coud be, no street lights at all, raining hard and sidewalks not of the best, yet we had a good audience. They have a splendid lot, 170x100 feet, the chapel and parlors only have, as yet, been erected, but some day a splendid church building must be there. F F. Schultz, 1325 Webster Ave., St. Louis, has just closed a good work at Hematite, and the brethren manifested their appreciation of the same in liberal support of the work. He has done no work that has not manifested its results in the brethren's calling him again to their help, and he goes to New Florence to help the little band there struggling against terrible odds, and the Board believe he will do for them as at Henatite, and if you want his help in northeast Missouri, write immediately or take chances.

The rally at Cam-ron was one after my own heart, taking work and planning by leaders, White, Brown and Baker, and then execution by scores of workers. The exercises were prepared by Miss Dollie C aig, a blind lady, and were unique and most acceptable to the immerse audience, while the offering ran over fifty dollars. Think of that! The sch ol gave $30 to our work.

At Fincett, Jn . P. Jesse was holding a meeting, but kindly gave your servant time night after night to present some feature of Bible-school work while the school and fri nds paid in full. In the homes of Christian friends the work in all features was discussed and new plans suggested.

At Garden Prairie, E. J. Shreves, his wife, and C. O. Sackett were very cordial to your secretary, and the rally was an all day time, with basket dinner and fine attention and much enthusiasm. The work was intended to interest the brethren in State Bible school work and the r sults were good, thanks to those whose hearts are with us in the

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE LIGHT.

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chapter III.—The Reverend Mr. Henry.

The young preacher was himself a charter. Born of pious Kentucky parents, he ew up religiously inclined. Indeed, he uld not remember the day when he first lieved in Christ or felt inclined to do his

At the age of twelve he offered himself r membership in the Third Baptist Church the city where his parents lived. As his rents vouched for his good behavior and one knew of any fault serious enough to considered, he was promptly voted in, as proper subject for baptism and memberip in the Baptist Church. He did not sume to have a miraculous conversion, nor 1 he relate any mysterious experience. I was just a good boy and eager to obey a Lord, and he was baptized by the miner without any extended examination.

At the same time the boy had two boy iends, of his age, who were moved with e same desire. They went forward with m and sat on the seat with him. But the rents of these two interfered, and thwarted eir desire. One was the son of a very sh woman, who felt complimented when e preacher called her Martha because she is a very superior cook and pre ared very aborate meals. She had trodden life's thway alone till thirty three years of it I been compassed. And, filling the office school ma'am, she accepted work on the xington Pike where she attracted the adration of a six hundred acre farm with a dower on it.

The widower laid siege to the citadel of her affections; and after two years of strenuous persuasion he took her surrender and she took his name, and at once assumed control of the land.

George Highblood was her second child and only son; and, when she saw him actually sitting on that front bench with that Henry boy and Joe Bristow, she arose and strode forward in her most majestic manner, displaying fifteen yards of Marseiles silk, diamond sets in rings, bracelets and ear pendants, and an over-sufficiency of rich laces, and, being sure she had the attention of the whole audience, she took the manly little fellow by the hand and led him back to her seat in the rear of the house.

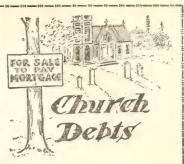

Mrs. Bristow, supposing that to be the la'est from Paris and Lexington, did likewise with Joe; Timmy Henry was left to pass the ordeal alone. Not deterred by what had happened, he answered the two or three questions intelligently and bore himself like a little hero. And how sincere he was! And how sad were his two chums, debarred in this meddlesome way, in this short-sighted and godless way, from the enjoyment of the same happiness!

Timothy Henry went forward in his obedience, and rose from baptism to walk in newness of life. At the age of sixteen he had already begun to preach the gospel as interpreted by the Missionary Baptists. But poor George! Poor Joe! They returned to their former tastes and never again could either of them become interested in questions religious. George became a turf sport with the low notions of the jockey. More than a hundred times his mother tried to induce him to go to church; but all relish for such things was gone. Over and over again, she wept real tears because of his godless and profane course. But nothing availed to assuage her grief. About the time they all reached the age of twenty, Timothy Henry was ordained to preach, George Highblood was a confirmed turf-gambler (with saloon and brothel attachments), and Joe Bristow was dead! Dead, by violence! Dead, by means of a severed jugular in a disgraceful bawdy-house fight.

Timothy's preaching attracted much attention, and at the first association he attended he met a delegation from Indiana who invited him to make them a visit at Sunrise. He was then eighteen; but being a fluent speaker and an excellent singer he struck the Sunrise people favorably, and they employed him, half time, to preach for them. The young people were especially fond of him; and several of the maneuvers of arxious mammas were noticed by other mammas; each one being unconscious of the suspicion of every other, and supposing her operations were entirely invisible.

The young preacher was all ignorant of such games; and went on extending the borders of his activity. Freely mingling with the village people, he met in the Methodist Sunday-school a sweet girl whose singing and playing and hair and eyes, without a maneuver on her mother's part, captured him and held him prisoner.

With the ardor and precipitancy of youth,

ERY likely the Dorcas Society, The King's Daughters, or the Young People's Society want funds to carry on their work this winter. Perhaps you have in contemplation a new organ, or carpet for the Sunday-school, or possibly the question of paying off the Church debt is troubling you. We have a plan for providing money for any of these objects.

and without much of prudent calculation, he proposed a marital union with her; and she, as little calculating as he, accepted his offer and they were engaged. So far was the mother from maneuvering that she objected to the match. And her objection was the queerest imaginable. It was not that Henry was a Baptist; nor that Ruby was too young; nor that they were both poor: nor that she objected to her daughter's wedding a preacher; but it was jealousy! She had flattered herself that no man would ever be able to win Ruby away from her. And she could not be reconciled to the fact. She tried abusing Timothy; but that only brought the daughter to his defense; and at last she had to consent to the marriage to prevent a run away match. It was all the work of a few weeks; and, before the first year had half elapsed, the twain were made one; he eighteen years of age and she not quite sixteen. It is said that a preacher cannot marry and remain. But Ruby took membership in the Baptist Church and at once displayed rare womanly traits. Her husband was wonderfully active; and under their joint efforts the church began to grow and prosper.

It was the feeblest of the three congregations of the village; but the boy preacher commanded more than his share of credit, for his audiences were large and all the public exercises of the church were well-attended.

It was never until his resignation occurred at the Bend that animosity sprang up against him. But Job Norris was so exemplary a citizen in Sunrise that a great deal was said there about his exclusion from the congregation, and, some way, the blame seemed to fall upon the preacher. He was asked about it and seemed fond of explaining the reason for the committee's action; all of which he justified on the plea of church loyalty. He repeated his sermons on that subject until the officers counseled a change of the subject. "There are no cases of disloyalty here," they said; "and you sermons sound exactly as if we had such cases." It was really an extreme anxiety to justify his action in the Norris case that caused this error.

For the whole two years of their married life, Timothy and Ruby had been annoyed by the curt remarks and the unkind flings of the unreconciled mother. She had even tried to win back the daughter after she was married. And, now that the preacher's sky seemed to be clouded, she broke out afresh, making false allegations. So, too, others, who in various ways had felt aggrieved, but had kept silent on account of Henry's noble work, now piped in and assisted the gossip of the mother in-law. The toughs who had felt Timothy's respectability and knew him to be far too clean for them, had much pleasure in seeing him humiliated and in hearing him slandered. "Lige" was in his glory. Henry had playfully remarked that Sunrise was cheated in the exchange of blacksmiths; and when the news came that the preacher had assisted in turning him out of church, Taggart fairly swelled with exultation. "He 'dort to a-ben turned out. An' ef it wuz all found out, the preacher hisself 'dort to, too! Didn't I see 'im a-drinkin' out'n a bottle in the lumber yard? An' haint 'e 'ntirely too thick with them gals as do 'is singin'?"

Thus, one by one, the viler classes took up the gossip that was started until Henry was charged with everything, from failing to pay his store accounts to running away from his wife.

He had made a couple of tours to central Indiana, hoping to find employment for the other two Sundays; and while on these errands, both times this was said of him, the sweet wife having to hear it from her unreasonable mother. Finding a field that would do, he returned in high glee, and supposed himself situated for the winter; but behold! the clouds had thickened so at Sunrise that he found his wife very unhappy. "Let us go away from this hateful place!" said she. She detailed the speeches that her mother reported to her from Mrs. Marcum, and Mrs. Arrowshot and Mrs. Loyalty, all of whom had discovered how they could please Ruby's mother by saying wicked things to her about the preacher.

Feeling that he could do better further north, the young man pleased several of the Sunrise people by resigning and moving away.

He was suffering more from the constantly re-appearing vision of that godly blacksmith than from all the falsehoods that were circulated at his expense. He hoped a removal to an interior settlement would reduce the poignancy of that picture; and he was glad his wife desired to go.

He took residence at Luzon, a very nice inland village, situated exactly midway between the two churches which had employed him. They were two small congregations of good people; one named Little Blue on his right and the other called Williams Chapel on his left as he faced the land of his former labors. He was just beginning to feel adjusted to his work and had drawn a month's salary when down upon his head poured a whole avalanche of scandal from Sunrise. The unfortunate feature of it was, however, that the neighbors all heard it before he did. The first intimation he had of it was brought to him by a committee from Little Blue, who requested him to suspend work wi h them until the charges were investigated.

Like the prophets and apostles of old, he was brutally maligned and falsely accused, and although conscious of innocence found himself unable to prove it.

He requested the Little Blue congregation to do him the justice of appointing a committee who should go to the fields of his former work and give his case a fair examination. All he wanted was the truth. This righteous measure they agreed to adopt, and the next day the committee started.

Practical Sermons From Revised Texts.

Subject: Get.

TEXT: It is more blessed to get than to give. —Acts 20:35.

The Lord blesses those who bless themselves. My brethren, if you would amount to anybody in the world you must get up and get. "Faint heart never won fair You can't do anything unless you lady." have the stuff. We must have money to do good with. It takes money to carry on the church and to send missionaries to China. When Jesus found his work lagging he took a collection. He spent thirty years laying up money at the carpenter's bench to carr on his three years' campaign. All the world is after money, and you want to get all you can and keep all you get. That is the chief end of life. All great men were rich. Look at Rockefeller and Vanderbilt and Jesus and Solomon and Paul. They spent their lives in getting because they realized that the Lord leveth a cheerful getter. If Jesus had not been a millionaire, we would never have heard of him. Nearly all our senators are millionaires. But if you can't get a million you can at least manifest the spirit of getting an i get what you can, even though you can't get a whole living. When you make a trade get all you can and give as little as possible. Get. Get land. Get wisdom. Get religion. Get money. And when you die get a mansion in the skies.

Let us all get.

Trouble in the kitchen. The ever lasting servant question, that is spoiling homes, ruining tempers and blasting happiness all over Christendom.

There's wrong on both sides. O course there is. Mistress and ser vant have grievances. Neither car remedy the mischief alone.

But Christianity dare not leave the problem unsolved. It is part of the great gospel of service, applicable in kitchen no less than kirk, over the stove as well as over the counter

How would Jesus have us solve the problem? Who can answer this question better than Charles M Sheldon, the world-renowned author of "In His Steps," the most popular book written in the English lan guage? And he has answered it in a serial of thrilling interest and in spiring helpfulness, "Born to Serve," soon to be published in The Chris tian Endeavor World (Tremon Temple, Boston), one of the bright est of our religious weeklies. A Tale of the Airly Days.

Oh tell me a tale of the airly days—
Of the times as they ust to be;
"Piller of Fire," and "Shakespeare's Plays,"
Is a'most too deep for me!
I want plain facts, and I want plain words,
Of the good old-fashioned ways,
When speech run free as the songs of birds—
'Way back in the airly days.

Tell me a tale of the timber lands,
And the old-time pioneers—
Somepin' a poor man understands
With his feelin's, well as ears;
Tell of the old log house—about
The loft and the puncheon floor—
The old fire-place, with the crane swung out,
And the latch-string through the door.

Tell of the things just like they wuz—
They don't need no excuse!
Don't tetch 'em up like the poets does,
Till they're all too fine for use!
Say they wuz 'leven in the family—
Two reds and the chist below,
And the trundle-beds 'at each helt three;
And the clock and the old bureau.

Then blow the horn at the old back door
Till the echoes all halloo,
And the children g-thers home one't more,
Jest as they ust to do;
Blow fer Pap till he hears and comes,
With Tomps and E ias, too,
A-marchin' home, with the fife and drums,
And the old Red, White and Blue!

Blow and blow—till the sound draps low
As the moan of the whipperwill,
And wake up Mother, and Ruth, and Jo,
All sleepin' at Bethel Hill;
Blow and call till the faces all
Shine out in the back-log's blaze,
And the shadders dance on the old hewed wall,
As they did in the airly days.

"Tardy Thanksgiving."

BY CAL OGBURN.

(Illustrated Sermon.)

Despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and lorgsuffer ng; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? Rom 2:4

Praise waiteth for thee, O God! and unto thee shall the vow b pe formed. . . . Thou crownst the year with thy goodness. Ps. 65:1,11.

A few years ago a far ner who lived then and is still living in one of the most fertile sections of the "great corn belt" in the upper Mississippi valley, was busy one hational Thanksgiving day harvesting the abundant crop of corn that his land had proluce 1 and did "not have time to spare" or the desire to attend the thanksgiving service held by his neighbors that day in the village church, only a short distance from where he was at work, to render to the Great Giver a bribute of grateful praise for the bountiful harvest with which he had blessed their abor. His wife, too, a most devoted Christian, was one of the thankful worshipers, but this man, basely ungrateful for God's rich bounty, spent the day in his field.

One of his horses was blind, a d because it could not "follow the row" he repeatedly cursed and beat it till at last his abuse of the poor animal caused a sense of shame to come to him—and he began to reflect.

"Here I am," he mused, "the most ungrateful man in the world. God has greatly blessed my labor—my ground has brought forth abundantly—and instead of being thankful I am a perfect ingrate, orofaning God's name and abusing this blind horse with which I cultivated my field. My yield of corn is as large as or larger than that of my neighbors, and while they are assembled to express with thanksgiving their appreciation of God's goodness, I am selfishly harvesting my great crop, and cursing the Giver and shamefully abusing this poor dumb, blind animal without which I could not have cultivated my land. My wife, too, is in that church yonder on the hill expressing her gratitude to God and doubtless praying—as she has so often done—that I may become a better man. I am unworthy to be the hus band of such a wife. How thankless and mean I am. I will repent towards God and amend my ways."

That evening when he went home he said to his wife, "God has crowned my life with innumerable blessings and I have never shown the least gratitude. You know too well how profane I have been, and you will no doubt be surprised when I tell you that I have quit swearing, but such is the case. You will never hear me utter another oath. Nor will I ever again abuse my horses. I am heartily ashamed of myself, and God helping me I will be a different man.

Then he explained to his wife how this purpose had come to him that day, and they mingled their voices in true thanksgiving.

Not long after that he made a public confession of his faith in Christ, and has ever since lived as an exemplary Christian, filling many places of usefulness in the church.

At the approaching Thanksgiving he will attend religious services in the new and commodious church that he was instrumental in building where the old one stood, and with his wife and children and neighbors will return unselfish praise for the bounty of the year. Or he will have joined the "choir invisible" to sing a new song of thanksgiving with the redeemed. In any event he will "praise God from whom all blessings flow," ascribing his repentance—and joy—to the unfailing goodness of that One from whom all blessings, both temporal and spiritual, terrestrial and celestial, come.

APPLICATION.

Sadly enough there are many persons who have never permitted the goodness of God to lead them to repentance. 'Year after year their lives have been crowned with his unending goodness, yet they receive with increasing selfishness and growing ing atitude the daily bounty of the Gracious Giver. Surely not a minute passes that does not bring its complement of blessings, placing us thereby under renewed obligation to the Wise Provider. Shall we not at this Thanks giving season reflect thoughtfully upon the goodness of Godduring he year, that we may be led to repentance and a better life? Our Father has been waiting long for our tardy thanksgiving. Let us say, "Unto Thee shall the vow be performed."

The Advance Society.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

The time has come for us to have our monthly talk among ourselves. have the floor I wish to express once more my pleasure in the growth and success of the Advance Society. We always want new members, but they are not as important as the old ones. I've seen some churches that thought twice as much of a new member as they did of one who had been on hands a long time. They seemed to think that if they could get 'em fresh, they'd keep up the church, and if they couldn't, the old ones might spoil. Well, we're not that a-way about our society. We want to keep all the old members so we will feel more at home and comfortable. You know you can have lots more fun in your old clothes than you can in your very best. So I exhort the members not to get tired of the five resolutions. but to persevere till the habit of reading good literature becomes a part of your nature. But here is Lola Cox. How do you do, Lola? How do you like "Pete"? "I think I shall like the new story fine. I think the Tramp will turn out to be good. I am still your member." Of course you are, and a very faithful one. As to the Tramp, we will have more of him next week. And here is Julia Cox; how do you think the Tramp will turn out? Or, perhaps you are not reading our continued story? "I like the story 'Pete' well. I think it is exciting. It has not been going on long enough to tell how it will turn out. Our school began the first Monday in September. Our brother is our teacher." I think it is very nice to have your brother for a teacher. Then when you get whipped you don't mind it so much because you feel that it is all in the family.

Here comes Mary Emily Day with her picture which I feel sure she is going to give me. Yes, that is whom she brought it for! I am very much pleased. I have been expecting a report from you for some time, Mary. "I went visiting, so you see I did not report at the right time. I went with my mother, brothers and sisters to the street fair at Springfield, Mo. We had a general good time, visiting uncle, aunt and cousins. We had a fine drive of 25 mile, we went in the hack and on the way we stopped at a beautiful spring for lunch." Here is a sad little note from Maude Kelley, Beardsley, Minn., that will cause our members to sympath ze with her, and to love her because she has been in trouble: "I am very sorry to write this Our little baby died; so I failed to keep up the Advance Society work. I will try to keep the rules the next twelve weeks." Here is one of our most reliable members, you all know her by this time. Bertha Beesley: "It will soon be two years since I joined the Av. S. Only once have I failed to keep the rules. I have read a great deal of History which, but for the Av. S., I probably never would have read. I find it has done me good. I have liked all the continued stories. If the Society has done as much for others as it has done for me, I think you may well feel proud of your movement." I am proud of the society and of the boys and girls who so faithfully persevere in improving their minds. Among the latter must be classed Mrs. Dever, who comes with a question: "I have forgotten your address. Will you publish it on Children's Page? We will try not to forget it." My address, since I moved away from Plattsburg, is Central Christian College, Albany, Mo. You make three lines of it usually, but in order not to waste any space here, I have strung it all on one line, the big fish and little all together.

Ethel M. Taylor says: "Is the Red Box Clew going to come out in book form? I hope it will, for our school library wishes a copy. I believe 'Pete' is going to be very interesting. It starts out very favorably. If you cannot read my letter, please excuse me, for my pet kitty is lying on my lap trying to help me, or at least she seems to think my pen is a very nice plaything. Won't some of the members write to me? My address is Box 408, Harlan, Ia." The Red Box Clew will be published in book form, but when, how or where, has not yet been decided. As soon as I know definitely, I will announce it in our page.

I am proud of our Honor List this week, when I consider how hard it is to appear upon it. But I am surprised that only one boy is represented. Some failed to tell me which quarter they finished, so I have been obliged to guess at these, which the question mark will indicate. HONOR LIST: Charlie Hancock, Moselle, Mo. (2nd. quarter); Florence Belle Beattie and her aunt, Dover, Mo-(2nd?); Nannie D. Chambers, Richwood, Ky. (8th?); Ethel M. Taylor, Harlan, Ia. (6th.); Gerald Dever and Mrs. Daver, Hume, Ill. (8th.); Mary Errily Day, Sparta, Mo. (2nd?); Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo. (7th.); Julia Cox, Cox, Mo (8th.); Lola Cox, Cox, Mo. (7th?); Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark. (7th.). I think the above are all correct without the question marks, but we must get this thing exactly right.

Doubtless you remember Madge Masters' letter telling us how to plant sweet potatoes in Arkansas. She promises to write soon describing how you dig them. Charlie Hancock says, "I like the Advance Society very much and I like 'Pete' all right. She seems like a jolly girl. I haven't much to say only to give my best wishes to the Av. S." And Nannie D. Chambers says: 'Sometimes the Av S. work is work sure enough, but I in tend to keep at it. I am pretty busy now at school, as I want to try for ex mination in the common school branches next sum-'Pete' is fine. We all like it very much. I have read 263 pages of Miss Strickland's 'Lives of the Qu-ens of England'". (That is the very history I am reading at present, and, by the way, I wish to rec ommend it to all who are looking for a history that is as interesting as a story and as true as life.) "It is late now and everybody is in bed, so I will stop.'

It is getting pretty late, and I believe I will go to bed myself. So good-night.

Sunday - School.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

SOBER LIVING.*

The Sunday before Thanksgiving is now recnized everywhere as "Temperance Sunday," d the Lesson Committee assigns a temperce lesson for that day in all our Sanday-schools. view of the widespread evils of intemperance, is well to bring the subject to the attention of and young, on every favorable occasion. The esent lesson, however, has to do not only with emperance in the matter of strong drink, but at lack of self-control which is manifested in so my ways, and so disastrously, by all classes of lety. There are very many intemperate who ver taste strong drink. A full grown Christian one who has subdued his whole nature to the l of Jesus Christ. Every appetite, every facy, is consecrated to righteousness. To such one, drunkenness, unchastity, slander, recks conduct of any kind, is impossible. Such is temperance taught in this Scripture.

The author of this epistle is Paul, the apostle, it he wrote it to Titus, who had for many years on his companion in his journeys through Asia, redonia and Greece. Titus was a convert of al, and proved worthy of such spiritual parent. When Paul left Crete, near the close of his histry, he left Titus in charge, with instructus to "set in order the things that were want, and appoint elders in every city." It is plain to the Cretans were a people of low moral lals, and needed especially to cultivate the virus of self-restraint and honest industry. (See ap. 1:12,13.) The injunctions he gave to may not be wholly lost upon us, for their wester, alas, too common to day.

He first instructs Titus in the counsel he is to e to the aged men. They are to be "temperd, grave, sober-minded, sound in faith, in love, ibatience." (We prefer to use the revised verin this lesson, for its greater accuracy and fce.) The aged women, likewise, are to be verent in demeanor, not slanderers nor ensired to much wine, teachers of that which is od," It argues a sad condition of society when told men and women have to be exhorted to sriety. No more pitiful sight can be witnessed in that of gray hairs lying in the gutter. Strong cak is so deadly that not many survive to old who use it. With what noble pride does the inifather say to his children's children, "I have Per used the deadly stuff!" I saw, only a few is ago, an aged man come out of a saloon door, ving his lips with trem ling hand, and tottering the starte i down the street. I fancied I could hear angels weep and the demons laugh. What a cwn of shame to a long life, which might acchulate honors and virtues that would make Lutiful the end of the sou,'s earthly pilgrimage. other graces wait upon that of sobriety. Gvity, fidelity, love, patience, reverence, truthfaess, kindness-none are possible to the victim cdrink. It is told of a saint of old, that he was capelled to choose one of three vices to practe; and, after deliberation, he chose drunken-Is as the least sinful of the three. But he no e ner became intoxicated than he began practici the other two.

Paul then turns to the younger men and women, the enjoins on them the same virtues. He tells tolder women to teach their younger sisters to love their husbands, to love their children, to sober-minded, chaste, workers at home, kind, ing in subjection to their own husbands, that tword of God be not blasphemed." Love is the list of the home life, and when it is wanting the list dead. It may seem strange that Paul deems it necessary to exhort that wives be taught to love their husbands and children. But there are countless families in Christian lands to day where this lesson is hardly half learned. Many men seek the saloon for the good cheer they ought to find under their own roof. Many boys and girls escape from the sharp tongue of a scolding mother who little thinks that the love she really feels for them is counteracted by the hateful words that fall from her lips. Without excusing for a moment the selfshness and sensuality of man, which causes so much of the misery in unhappy homes, it is too palpable a fact that very many mothers fail utterly to realize their duty and privilege as the divinely chosen center of the home circle. Nor is the warning to women against strong drink entirely untimely to day. This evil habit is increasing in the very face of temperance agitation and growing Christian sentiment. Physicians are prescribing wines and beer as tonics, and the visits of the brewer's wagon are as regular to some homes as the grocer's the butcher's. The example of the mother is fraught with awful peril to the children, and the new-born babe may enter the world with the curse of her slavery upon it. Both fatherhood and motherhood should be counted too sacred a thing to be vitiated by any habit that pollutes the body, enfeebles the will and stains the white innocence of the soul.

The young men Paul exhorts to the same sobriety, and tells Titus to enforce his lessons by personal example. The only way to ensure respect for his teachings is to practice them. When no one is able to speak evil of a preacher's life, but little opposition will be offered to his teaching. But an unworthy life will make the most eloquent sermon fall upon heedless ears. "What you are speaks so loud I cannot hear what you say," says Emerson.

Even the humblest service, that of the slave, may be ennobled by the presence of such a spirit as Christ imparts. The apostle declares that it is impossible for the bondservant to "adorn the doctrine of God our Sav.our in all things." In early Christian history it was a common thing for a Christian alave to comport himself with such simple dignity and sincere fidelity as to win the absolute confidence of his master, and lead him to inquire more fully into the religion which wrought such a transformation. A Christian employe may so exhibit the spirit of his Master as to command the respect of his employer and fellow workmen. Christianity is intended to hallow every relation of life, and make every duty and opportunity sacred. It is for no exclusive class of people, nor does it purpose to affect man in only one part of his nature and life. The sublime declaration of the apostle is worthy of being written in letters of gold over every threshold, and across every highway where men travel: "The grace of God hath appeared, bringing salvation to all men, instructing us, to the intent that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world." Such as thus live may confidently look for the appearing of the Savior, "who gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a people for his own possession, zealous of good works." May we cherish this high ideal for ourselves and for our children.

TOPIC FOR NOV. 25.

PRAISE THE LORD.

(Ps. 147 1.20)

All nature praises God; the birds that sing, winds that roar, leaves that rustle, rain that falls. If we would give adequate praise to him, we should get in tune with nature One may praise God these autumn days by going out under the trees of the forests, into the crisp country air, and lifting up the heart in conscious or uncons ious adoration. So the great poets like our Psalmist have done. So little children do. Wordsworth, when a child, would go and stand alone in the darkness of the night, out of-doors, listening to the praises made vocal by the night-running water, the sighing wind, a chirping cricket. He was enchanted by these sounds.

Another great poetic soul, one of the Channings, so keenly sensitive to nature, when a little boy awoke one night with a bright star shining through his window into his face. Soon the group in the parlor chatting and laughing, heard the patter of little feet, and the father caught up in his arms his little white-robed boy who cried out: "O, father, the star! the star! I cannot bear it!" He was moved with awe, though not with terror, at the trightness and steadless of the shining.

It would be well for us if we could catch more of the deep reverence in nature, and join in it.

History also praise God. The clash of nations in commerce, and the greatness of rising emrires praises God. It would be worth while for us to get into the swing of it, to seek to trace God's hand in the politics of people and to come into sympathy with it.

A good life praises God; kindness to friends and strangers; self control and moderation, the fruits of the spirit: love, joy, peace, long suffering, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, all these praise God. There is, perhaps, no prayer that is surer to reach his ear than the prayer of a right life; no song that to him is sweeter music than the hymn of an upright and true life.

At this Thanksgiving season, then, it is ours to spend part of the holiday, if possible, in touch with nature; part of it in medicating upon our nation's blessings and opportunities; part of it in examining our lives to see if they be strictly what they should be; and then there should be a season of actual formal praise and worship.

Like our old Puritan ancestors, we ought not to forsake the assembling together on that day, to speak and pray and sing of G d's goodness. If to speak and pray and sing of Gid's goodness. denied this privilege, our homes should s und with singing, and with some formal celebration of the day. We have, indeed, too few holidays and feast and fast days. More such would doubtless add to the quietude and meditation of our lives Buffalo, N Y

Lesson Commentary

THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY, by W. W. Dowling, is the very best Sunday-school "help" published for Superintendents, Teachers and Advanced Pupils. For many years our leading Sunday-school workers have chosen it in preference to all others. The volume for 1901 is better than ever before. It is a handsome volume of 429 pages. It includes practical expositions of the International Lespractical expositions of the International Lessons for 1901, numerous maps, chronological tables of the Life of Jesus and of the Old Testament, a Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, with their pronunciation and meanings, blackboard designs, numerous illustrations, etc., etc. If you are a Sunday-school teacher you owe it to yourself and to those whom you teach to equip yourself with the whom you teach to equip yourself with the very best helps, and the best help, after the Bible, is THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY. This book is handsomely and substantially bound in cloth, stamped with black and gold. It is now ready for delivery. You should secure your copy in good season, that you may prepare for the first Sunday of the New Year.

A Word or Two to Our Readers.

We are fully persuaded that the list of readers of The Christian-Evangelist can and should be doubled this year. It would be difficult to predict the vast amount of good that would be done to the cause if such a result should be accomplished. A constant and patient teacher in the family circle would work wonders in educating and interesting the uninformed and lukewarm in the welfare of the church and in the attainment of the ends for which it was organized. Few, if any, of our preachers or interested workers will fail to agree with us concerning this matter. The question is, How are we to bring about this desirable state of affairs? What shall be done in order that there may be two readers where there is now but one? Here is the solution: on our part we promise to maintain and improve the quality of The Christian-Evangelist so that it will be fully equal to the accomplishment of the work indicated above, when it is afforded the opportunity. It is not boasting to say that we do not believe that there is a religious journal in the land that will be able to claim superiority over it. But with this done there remains one thing still absolutely necessary to attain success, and that is the hearty, earnest and active assistance of our present subscribers in securing others. You can do this; will you? In addition to the good to be accomplished, we have decided to offer the following to those co-operating with us in the cause of good literature. A perusal of the list will convince you that never have such wonderfully liberal offers been made to the readers of a religious journal.

Our faith and earnestness in undertaking to double our list of readers is shown in our willingness to give all of the profits of the first year's subscription (and more) to our present subscribers who assist us.

Please Note These Rules:

- 1. These premiums are offered only to subscribers of The Christian-Evangelist, or to members of the same household.
- 2. They are offered for new subscribers only. Our purpose is to increase our list. A change from one member to another of the same household does not increase it; hence, we can allow no premiums on such subscriptions.
- 3. Where offers in this premium list are accepted, no other concession in rate or commission is allowed. All subscriptions must be at the rate of $1.50 a year, and cash must accompany the order.
- 4. Remittances should be made by postoffice order, express order, or draft on St. Louis, Chicago, or New York, payable to Christian Publishing Company, 1522 Locust Street, St. Louis, Mo.
- 5. Order premium by letter, such as A, M or S. Where there are alternative premiums under the same letter, as in the case of I and N, be careful to indicate by title, as well as by letter, the premium desired.

Examine the Following List Carefully, and if you find nothing that especially appeals to your desires, take a copy of our latest Catalogue (we will send you one, if you have none), make your own selection, write to us about it, and we will tell you how many new subscribers you must secure to earn it as a premium. Or if there is anything else that you would prefer, we will try to arrange matters so that you may earn it in soliciting subscribers for The Christian-Evangelist.

SHEM: A Story of the Captivity.

By J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

Mr. Ellis is a young man, but he has won an enviable reputation as a writer, and especially as the author of several historical romances. The scene of the story is laid in Judea, and the time is six centuries before the birth of Christ. The author has given much careful study to the manners, customs and nature of the people from which his characters are taken. The tale is a stirring one, with action on every page.

The book contains 298 pages, substantially bound in heavy paper.

How to Understand and Use the Bible. 36.36.36

By J. H. BRYAN.

Says the author of this work: "To rightly understand the Word of God and skillfully use the Sword of the Spirit, should be the earnest desire of every disciple of Christ. In an effort to gratify this desire the author has gathered together that which is here set down in order, and presents it to the public with the hope that others may receive as much pleasure and profit in reading the book as he had in its preparation."

Origin of the Disciples of Stor Christ.

By G. W. LONGAN.

This volume is, primarily, a review of a book by Prof. Whitsett (Baptist), bearing the same title. Prof. Whitsett's book contained many untruthful and unfair statements concerning the Disciples of Christ, and these statements Mr. Longan meets and answers. Incidentally, he devotes some time and space to an accurate account of the origin of the current reformation. This is a valuable book, which should be in the library of current reformation. This is a valuable book, which should be in the library of every preacher.

WONDERS OF THE SKY:

*Or God's Glory Exhibited in the Heavens. *

By W. J. RUSSELL.

"The heavens declare the glory of God," and this book leads the mind of the reader to contemplate the beau y, grandeur, sublimity and wonders of the heavens, directing the mind to a better understanding of the universe and greater reverence for the Creator. The subject is treated, not from a scientific standpoint, but in a popular style calculated to be easily understood by the young of our times.

The author has looked reverently and thoughtfully into this older volume of God's Revelation, and states in a very clear and eloquent way some of the facts and truths which he has learned in this charming little book. May it serve to increase our reverence for God and the work of his hands, and awaken a deeper and more widespread interest in the study of those heavens which declare the glory of God, and the firmament which showeth his handiwork.—From Introduction by J. H. Garrison.

ALONE WITH GOD.

By J. H. GARRISON.

A Manual of Devotions. Being a series of meditations and forms of prayer for private devotion, family worship and special occasions.

One of the most useful, most needed and best adapted books we have ever issued, and therefore it is not strange that it is proving one of the most popular. In work of this kind its distinguished, gifted, pious and beloved author is at his best. While this book will be helpful to every minister, church official and Sunday-school superintendent, as well as every private member of the church of all ages, it is particularly well adapted to the wants of members of the Y. P. S. C. E. It has models of prayer suitable for the service of the prayer-meeting, while its suggestions, meditations and instructions are pre-eminently calculated to be of service in preparation for the solemn duties that rest upon Active Members. 244 pages. Cloth.

"Heavenward Way" and "Half Hour Studies at the Cross" are companion books by the same author and may be selected instead of "Alone With God."

LIFE OF KNOWLES SHAW. The Singing Evangelist.

By WM. BAXTER.

The material for this book consisted of the manuscripts of the deceased, reports of his work as found in various journals, both secular and religious, and the personal recollections of those who knew and loved him. The writer's work has been mainly that of collecting and arranging the material from the sources above mentioned.—P. eface.

His faith was strong; he was hopeful, earnest and industrious. God blessed his labors. In the course of twenty years he baptized above twelve thousand persons. He never compromised the truth. He taught it fearlessly, but kindly. We think the reading of this narrative of his lifelabors will intensify the courage, strengthen the faith, quicken the activity and energy of every Christian.—Gospel Advocate.

The Young People's Prayer-Meeting and Its Improvement.

By CAL OGBURN.

This book is the offspring of experience and observation, setting forth how to make the Young People's Prayer-meeting most interesting and profitable. Bound in cloth, with red edges.

I sincerely hope that this little book, "The Young People's Prayer-Meeting," will be widely read, because it contains so many practical hints and suggestions that can be of great service to the members of Christian Endeavor Societies. I feel sure that many a society can be greatly helped if its members study this book.—John Willis Baer, General Secretary of the United Societies.

Life of Alexander Campbell.

By T. W. GRAFTON.

This book gives a condensed, concise and accurate account of the life of this great religious reformer, beginning with his boyhood, and following him through his trials and triumphs. It is written in an attractive style. It is just the book for the busy people, who have not the time to devote, to a biography which contains, every detail in the life of Campbell. [1234 pages, 12mo, cloth.

I have read "Life of Alexander Campbell," by T. W. Grafton, and I want to say that I feel a profounder respect and higher admiration for that hero than ever before. The book has a mission.—C. C. Davis, Fort Dodge, Iowa.

While it is dedicated to the "Army of Young People," I wish to commend this book to the older ones and the preachers. Every preacher would be personally benefited by reading this review of a great life. Pastor Grafton has produced a book beyond criticism. His style is excellent.—A. M. Haggard.

People who know nothing about Mr. Campbell, and who wish to ascertain what manner of man he was and what he taught, can obtain from this volume the desired information. There are tens of thousands of church members who should buy this book and read and master it.—The Missionary Intelligencer, Cincinnati, O.

This concise work of "Life of Alexander Campbell," by Thomas W. Grafton, will be welcomed by the busy man in this rushing world. The book covers the entire career of Alexander Campbell, from his birth to his last labors, recalling his university life, trials and triumphs, defense of the faith, his ability as a preacher, his travels, his home life, and his place in history.—Christian Leader, Cincinnati, O.

Wheeling Through Europe.

BY WINFRED ERNEST GARRISON.

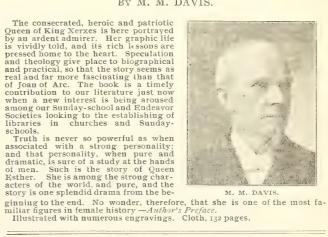

The author spent the summers of 1598 and 1899 traveling on a bicycle through Great Britain, France, Gérmany, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria and Italy. This story of his experiences is one of the nost enjoyable volumes on European travels ever written. Riding a wheel, Mr. Garrison was able to get away from the familiar roads frequented by tourists, and saw Europe as it cannot be seen by the traveler who is whirled over the country by steam. He has a fine sense of humor, and many of his accounts of experiences with obdurate officials and people who could not understand plain English, are exceedingly funny.

The volume is illustrated with half-tones made from photographs taken by the author. It is beautifully printed, and bound in cloth. 263 pages.

Young Folks in Bible Lands.

By B. W. JOHNSON.

Including Travels in Asia Minor, Excursions to Tarsus, Antioch and Damascus, and the Four of Palestine, with Historical Explanations. Of books of travel in the lands which are hallowed by Sacred History, there are few, and perhaps none, which will be read with such absorbing interest as this. The descriptive power of the author is well known to the reading public, but in this work he has taken special pains to write the story of his travels in the most interesting country in the world in a style which will attract the attention of young men and women and the ordinary reader. Interest is added by the sixty illustrations, many of them full-page, and altogether it is a work which will entertain, and at the same time instruct and benefit the reader. It is dedicated to "The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, and to all who love Him whose life and sufferings have made Palestine a Holy Land." Illustrated. 12mo, cloth.

This book contains 384 pages and more than 100 portraits and illustrations. The pictures of all the foreign missionaries of the Christian Church, their homes and places of worship, are among the illustrations. The author gives an account of what he saw, whom he saw, the many countries visited, the habits, customs and peculiarities of the nations through which he passed. The book is written in a most fascinating manner, enabling the reader to feel as though he had made the trip with the writer. The author set out from Cincinnati, Ohio, crossing the American continent to San Francisco, then across the Pacific Ocean to Japaa, stopping at Honolulu, then to China, India, Australia, Egypt, Palestine, Turkey, European countries to London, across the Atlantic to America, and then home The book gives the social, political and religious phases of the many nations visited by the author. CURRENT EVENTS.

Lord Rosebery delivered a striking address on the somewhat comprehensive subject of "The British Empire" last week, on the occasion of his installation as Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow. He predicted that the twentieth century will be a period of fierce and unprecedented international rivalry, chiefly in the arts of peace, and said that it, therefore, behooved Great Britain, if she would hold her own, to remodel her educational methods and state machinery, put away all antiquated methods and unitedly face the future. By all odds the most interesting part of the address was that section in which the speaker indulged in a flight of historical speculation as to what might have been. Had the elder Pitt not accepted a peerage and consequently left the House of Commons, he would have been able to prevent the extraordinary levies which were made upon the American colonies and to control the headstrong folly of George III. There would have been no American revolution. American representatives would have found a place in the British Parliament, the Reform Bill of 1832 would have been passed sooner and more easily. The increasing American representation would finally have overbalanced the British, even as the United States has surpassed Great Britain in population, and the world would have witnessed the unique and surpassing spectacle of the peaceful transfer of sovereignty from one shore of the Atlantic to the other. England would have remained an "historical shrine" and the business of government would be done in America. European complications would have been avoided. Ireland would have been appeased and satisfied and the ancient British Constitution rendered more elastic and comprehensive. For such a consummation as this and to have prevented all the strife and bitter feeling which there has been between the two countries since their separation, Lord Rosebery says he would be well content to see the British Parliament sitting in the farthest corner of the American continent. Rosebery is again beginning to loom large as a probable force in politics. Sir Campbell-Bannerman has invited him to assume the general leadership of the Liberal party and it is believed that this proposition was made with the concurrence of the other leaders. It is by no means improbable that Lord Rosebery will find his way back into active political life before the opening of the February session of Parliament. And if he does the Liberal party will (as the matter looks at this distance) be in a much stronger position.

The guesses upon Cabinet possibilities are all off. President McKinley has requested all the present members of the Cabinet to remain with him during his second term. There may be resignations in individual cases, but there will be no general reorganization. This shuts off from the political prophets the most fruitful of all the ordinary themes of post-election guessing. The individual whose "eminent services to the party," in the opinion of his friends, can only be adequately repaid by the gift of a Cabinet position; the party potentate of the erstwhile doubtful but now safely Republican state. who demands for his state representation in the Cabinet; the political journalist who revels in speculation upon Cabinet possibilities and has two or three slates ready for publication before complete election returns are in-these will all suffer by the announcement of the President's intention. How can the President retain the good will of the press when he has thus ruthlessly killed so much good space-filling matter? There is nothing to do now but re-open the discussion as to when the twentieth century begins.

The world's parliaments are getting ready for their winter's work. Congress opens December 3. The session of British parliament, which was to have met early in December, has been postponed until next February. The French Chamber of Deputies opened last week, and this, together with the expected visit of Paul Kruger to Paris and the excitement over the alleged discovery of the secret mechanism of a French field gun by a spy of the United States War Department, gives the boulevard press plenty to talk about for the present. The German Reichstag opened on November 14 with a very tame speech from the Kaiser. It was a disappointment to all who were looking for a sensational statement of Germany's relations to England, or of a new Chinese policy under the new Chancellor. The Kaiser's speech from the throne, like Lord Salisbury's Guild Hall speech of the week before, makes little of the Anglo-German agreement and much of the common interest which moves all the Powers to act in concert. One task which is before the Reichstag is to provide for the expenses growing out of the military activity in China. But although there has been some criticism of the sending of a military expedition without the sanction of the Reichstag, there is no doubt but that the required revenue will be voted.

An anti-vice crusade is about to launched in Greater New York. This is not an unprecedented event. New York has had anti-vice crusades before and she needs them periodically as a sort of moral house-cleaning. The distinguishing feature of this one is that it is preached by two advocates of such different sort as Bishop Potter and Mr. Richard Croker. Some weeks ago the Bishop announced his intention of writing a letter to Mayor Van Wyck in regard to the lawleseness and disorder on the east side and particularly apropos of the insults which had been tendered to an Episcopal clergyman who had ventured to remonstrate against the failure to execute the laws. The letter has been published and it is an admirably clearspoken appeal to the Mayor to see that those laws are enforced which have been enacted for the restraint of vice. The same subject has been brought up in a meeting of the Executive Committee of Tammany Hall and one of Mr. Croker's last acts before starting abroad was to aid in the selection of a committee of five to co-operate with individuals or associations for the suppression of vice on the east side. Mr. Croker and the Tammany braves have hitherto never been detected in the exhibition of any great enthusiasm for virtue for its own sake, and it is scarcely surprising that their unwonted zeal at this moment is attributed by many to a desire to strengthen the power of Tammany Hall which, as shown by the recent election, is at present under a cloud of popular disapproval. The police board has taken the matter up; the president of the board has written an encouraging reply to Bishop Potter's letter; and an inspector and a captain of police are to be tried before the commissioners for neglect of duty.

Dispassionate observers of the situation in China are beginning to wonder whether the allies have not introduced quite as much disorder and lawlessness as they were sent to prevent. From the beginning there have been reports, more or less lacking in confirmation, of terrible atrocities committed against the non-combatant Chinese by European soldiers. Such stories are being repeated with a degree of authority and of circumstantial detail which makes it impossible to doubt their substantial correctness. The worst accusations are brought against the Germans, who seem more than the others to be actuated by a savage spirit of revenge. The destruction of the tombs of the Ming dynasty, for instance, to cite a case which involves vengeance upon the dead as well as the living, was a particularly inexcusable piece of vandalism. These magnificent tombs, fifteen miles northwest of Pekin, were a group of marble terraces, balustrades and houses, "carved with the delicacy of an ivory jewel case" and representing the very best of Chinese archite:ture, as well as being the object of great religious veneration. Their destruction by a column of German troops is a no less barbaric and unnecessary measure than would have been the destruction of the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris by the German invaders. We are glad to note that the American authorities have protested against all such unnecessary acts of vengeance. In the absence of the regular Chinese authorities, highway robbery and murder have become common in many quarters so that business in North China has been at a standstill. The Russians, it is said, protect only the railways and make no effort to prevent or punish the crimes of native highwaymen which are committed even within their sight.

There is coming to be a general feeling that the international tribunal at Pao Ting Fu, which has already condemned several Chinese to death and caused them to be executed, has made a great mistake. The natives consider as martyrs all who have met death in any way at the hands of the foreigners. Moreover, the execution of those who had surrendered at the command of the Chinese Peace Commissioners has the superficial appearance, at least, of treachery. It was the understanding that if sentences were passed they would be executed by the Chinese authorities. The Dowager Empress makes this the plausible excuse for refusing to accept the assurances of the Powers that she and the court can return to Pekin with perfect safety. The tribunal, however, is still sitting in Pao Ting Fu and is still carrying on its work of condemning and executing.

The ministers at Pekin have almost finished their work of arranging the terms of a preliminary treaty as stated approximately in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of last week. There are, however, two questions still open: First, the Li Kin tax, a tax levied on the transportation of all merchandise according to distance, the most lucrative of all Chinese taxes, but one which has the disadvantage of practically prohibiting trade with the more remote parts of the interior; second. the recognition of Pu Chan, son of Prince Tuan, as heir apparent to the throne. The latter is a particularly embarrassing point. The latest decree of the Dowager Empress degrades Princes Tuan and Chwang from their official positions and sentences them to imprisonment for life. The ministers may consider even this punishment too light for Tuan and may insist upon his death. In either case the disgrace of the father is inherited by the children, and Pu Chan, whose adoption by the former Emperor a few years ago placed him in the line of succession to the throne and scored a great victory for the anti-foreign element, is a son of Prince Tuan. The question is, considering the importance which the Chinese attach to the matter of ancestry, can the son of a con demned and punished criminal ever a cede to the imperial dignity? True, his adoption by the former Emperor makes him technically no longer the son of Tuan, but on the other hand his edu ation has been of the most rigidly anti-foreign sort—so much so that the two tutors who have had full control of his training committed suicide on the entrance of the allies into Pekin. It is not improbable that, either in the preliminary ne. otiations or the final treaty, provision will be introduced for a different successor to Kwang Su.

The latest "yellow peril" scare is voiced by one of the St. Petersburg dailies which looks forward with fear and trembling to the possible dismemberment of the Chinese Empire and the effe t of that event on Asiatic and European Russia. Once the celestial empire is dissolved and its territory distributed among the several Powers, the natives, no longer bound to it by the ties of patriotism or natural affection, will seek to escape as quickly as possible. The easiest egress, says the Russian paper, will be toward the west, and the Czar's dominions will in consequence be flooded by Chinese immigrants to a degree which will imperil its very existence. This fantastic terror which has taken possession of our St. Petersburg contemporary shows that our Pacific slope has no longer a monopoly on the fear of Chinese immigration.

Even the repeated delays in the passage of the Nicaragua Canal Bill cannot destroy the popular interest in that enterprise. It is a thing so obviously needed and so thoroughly approved by a large proportion of the people, that they cannot cease to hope for it. In spite of the pessimistic prediction that the great grandchildren of this generation will still be expecting the passage of the Nicaragua Canal Bill from one session of Congress to the next, it really appears that there is some chance of getting it through this time. The bill which passed the House at the last session will be one of the first measures to come before the Senate. It is on the calendar by special order for December 10. The bill, as passed by the House, provides that the United States Government shall acquire from Nicaragua and Costa Rica the right to construct the canal; authorizes the Secretary of War to build and fortify it at a cost of not more than $140,000,000; and appropriates $10,000,000 with which to begin work. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not mentioned. It occurs to the casual observer that fixing a limit to the cost of an enterprise like this is very much like setting a limit to the cost of a war. A government must in either case count the cost as accurately as possible before deciding whether to undertake it or not, but when once begun it must be finished at any cost.

The letting of a contract to the Carnegie and Bethlehem steel companies for $16,000,000 worth of armor plate, marks the end of a long and bitter struggle between the government and the steel makers. The price originally asked for this Krupp armor was $545 a ton and the lowest bid in the competition of last August was $490. The present contract was made at a maximum rate of $45553. It is intended for seventeen ships now in various stages of construction, including eight battle-ships, sx armored cruisers and three protected cruisers. Admiral O'Neill, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, says that the United States in making this contract is buying armor more cheaply than any European government can.

General MacArthur's recent report from the Philippines deals with the general situation, the character of the natives, the effects of the election, and other matters not usually expected in a military report. But on the whole there is a pleasing exhibition of insight into the real situation and the people with whom he has to deal, whether he is correct or not in his opinion as to the causes of the long-continued rebellion. The continuance of the war, he says, is due solely to the activity of place-seekers like Aguinaldo. The Filipinos, ordinarily peaceable and mild, have been "maddened during the past five years by rhetorical sophistry and stimulants applied to national pride, until power of discriminating in matters of public concern or private interest has been almost entirely suspended." It is General MacArthur's opinion that it is not possible at present to organize the natives into an independent republic, but he says ultimate performance of the task will be rendered less difficult by the absence of firmly fixed principles, feudal laws and established customs of government which would have to be eradicated before American principles could be introduced.

The Anglo-American Commission, otherwise known as the circumlocution office, is about to re-open negotiations in regard to the long list of more or less important differences of opinion now standing between the two governments. At the last session the deadlock on the Alaska boundary question, which was only temporarily broken by the adoption of a modus vivendi unsatisfactory to the United States, prevented the Commission from issuing any report upon the other subjects. Now, after a year of silence, this most vexing question will be left for settlement by direct negot ation between the two governments, and the Commission will debate several other matters of long standing and lesser moment: the Behring Sea and seal-fishery matter; the unmarked boundary at several points in Maine, Wisconsin and Minnesota; the Newfoundland fisheries question; the regulation of fisheries on the great lakes; the immigration of alien labor into the United States from Canada; commercial reciprocity; the regulation of the bonding system, by which goods are taken from one country to the other in bond, and of international transportation; reciprocal mining privileges; wrecking and salvage on the ocean and the great lakes. The Canadian premier, Sir Wilfred Laurier, is at the head of the Canadian delegation in the Commission and Senator Fairbanks of the American.

THE TWO GREAT COMMAND-MENTS.

We are justified on the authority of the world's greatest Teacher to say that religion consists in the recognition of the relation between man and God and between man and man, and the discharge of the duties growing out of these relationships. In other words, love to God and love to our fellowmen is, on the one hand, to obey God, and on the other to serve each other, and this is the sum and substance of religion. The attempt to separate these two commandments and to found religion upon either one alone can never prove successful. They are mutually complementary to each other.

It has been the fault of the church in the past to lay too exclusive emphasis on the first of these commandments, making much of man's duty to God and giving slight, if any, emphasis to our social obligations. In other words, religion was conceived of as having but one dimension, namely the vertical, while the horizontal dimension, reaching outward toward our fellowmen, was largely lost sight of. During that period we heard much about man's saving his soul, but little about saving society, government and humanity. There was, it must be confessed, a good deal of selfishness in this conception of religion.

Of late there has been a decided swing of the pendulum in the direction of humanitarianism. Much is said now about religion's consisting in doing good to our fellowmen, in bearing each other's burdens, in feeding the hungry, in clothing the naked, in visiting the sick and so ameliorating the condition of the most unfortunate classes of society. All this is well, provided in laying emphasis upon this phase of practical Christianity men do not swing too far from God and forget that the source of all power for lifting our fellowmen is in Him, and that we can only love our fellowmen as we ought to because we love God supremely. There is already abundant reason for fearing that some of our modern sociological movements may become purely ethical or humanitarian, thus losing the power and motive for accomplishing the very work they profess to have in view. Already, in some instances, the church is disregarded and brushed aside as an effete and obsolete institution which must give way to something more modern which shall expend its energy in providing for man's material nature. This tendency must be deprecated by every true lover of humanity who recognizes in Christ the only effectual remedy for human ills.

Said one of these sociologists recently, who was giving much time and thought to the problem of elevating the Submerged Tenth, "The church needs less theology and more care for the p or and helpless." If the theology which any church has is an obstacle in the way of its extending sympathy and aid to the down-trodden and oppressed, it is not less of such theology that it needs, but a different kind of theology. The church that is permeated with the theology which conceives of God as coming down to men in the person of Jesus Christ, living, suffering and dying for humanity in order to lift it up into union with Himself, is the only church that is properly equipped for ministering to the despised, the forsaken, the outcasts of society. Of that kind of theology no church is likely to have too much. It is a matter of common knowlege that those churches and ethical organizations which have let loose their hold upon God as incarnated in Jesus Christ are doing the least to lift up humanity out of its sin and degradation into newness of life. The hope of this world is that it may be lifted out of its sin and misery by men who, holding on to the divine Christ with one hand, reach out the other to rescue the perishing.

Is it not, therefore, the duty of the church to see to it that it does not separate these two great commandments, but that it gives due emphasis to each? The church does not want to become less theological, but more sociological. It does not want to know less about God, but it needs to care more for men. It does not need to love God less, but humanity more. It is only as the church loves Christ and enters into fellowship with Him and with His thoughts and His plans for the salvation of the world that it can fulfill its great mission as a divine instrumentality for blessing mankind. Come and Go are the two great words of the gospel. "Come unto me, and learn of me, and take my yoke," and then "Go into all the world to bless humanity." But the Coming must precede the Going. The divine plan is for man to get right with God first, and then, receiving strength from God, seek to help his fellowmen. These are the two inseparable parts of the divine plan for the world's salvation.

REASONS FOR THANKSGIVING.

(Luke 17:11-19; 1 Thess 5:18.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic Nov. 28.] CENTRAL TRUTH: Thanksgiving for blessings received is a duty we owe alike to ourselves and to the gracious Giver.

Jesus had turned his face steadfastly toward Jerusalem on His last visit to Judea. On his way thither, passing through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, He met as he entered into a certain village ten lepers who, standing off at a distance, cried unto Him, saying, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us." The Master's heart went out in instant compassion and He said unto them, "Go and shew yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, as they went, they were cleansed." What an experience this must have been to them, to discover as they went along that their leprosy was healed! What an occasion for joy and for thanksgiving! And yet, strange to say, only one of the ten "when he saw that he was healed, turned back, with a loud voice glorifying God; and he fell upon his face at His feet, giving Him thanks." No wonder Jesus asked, "Were not the ten cleansed? but where are the nine? Were there none found that returned to give glory to God, save this stranger?" The only thankful one was a Samaritan. Is it too much to say that about one-tenth of the people are thankful to God for the blessings they receive from Him? It is certain, at least, that there are many who, though they experience the blessings of God's grace and providence, never think it worth while to glorify God on this account or to give Him any thanks.

Every one who is a Christian has received from Christ a blessing far greater than the healing of leprosy. He has had his sins forgiven; he has been renewed in his mind and heart; he has received a new meaning of life and its duties, and every relation of life has been made holier and more blessed by what he has learned of and received from Christ. And yet, how many are ungrateful for these blessings, if we are to judge them by their lives. Surely, if one is grateful to Christ for what He has done for him, he will be faithful in all his Christian obligations and will be diligent in conveying to others the same blessings he has received. He will also express his thanks upon all suitable occasions. On Thanksgiving day, as the Lord looks down upon the assembled people, will He not have reason to say, as of old. Were there not more than this healed? Where are the remainder? Paul tells the Thessalonians to "pray without ceasing; in everything give thanks; for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus to you-ward." The ground of thanksgiving in this passage is considerably widened. We are taught "in everything to give thanks." This must mean that we are to give thanks for sickness as well as for health, for adversity as well as prosperity, for persecutions, stripes and imprisonment as well as for brotherly love and kindest treatment. Why not? If it be true that "all things work together for good to them that love God and are called according to His purpose," why should we not be thankful for every providence by which we are made more meet for the Master's use?

It is the season of the year when, according to national custom, we meet in our respective places of worship to remember all the blessings of the year to the nation, to the family and to the individual, spiritual and material, and give God thanks. It is a great thing for a people thus to recognize God as the source of all blessing and feel their obligations to Him for what he has so generously bestowed upon them.

Let us not forget, however, that one of the ways, and perhaps the most acceptable way, of manifesting our gratitude to God for His blessings, is to seek to share them with our fellowmen who have received a less measure of them than ourselves, "for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus" to us-ward.

Another thing we ought not to forget: In recounting our blessings we can but be reminded of our unworthiness and it is a good time to seek forgiveness when we are remembering what great things the Lord hath done for us.

PRAYER.

O, Thou fount of every blessing, we lift our hearts to Thee in gra:itule for the unnumbered mercies that have crowned our lives during the year past. For life and health, for home and family and kindred and friends, for the church and its fellowship and its Christian activities, for sins forgiven, for strength imparted to us in time of need, for Thy guidance in hours of darkness and for all the joys, the inspirations and the sweet companionships of the life that now is and the hope of life eternal, and we give Thee unfeigned thanks, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

From St. Louis to the capital of the Old Dominion isn't a very long distance in these days of steam-drawn palace cars. The ride at this season of the year, when Nature has donned her imperial robe, presents a succes. sion of scenes which delight the eye and make one forget time and distance. Now the fertile, level plains of Illinois, now the hemp fields and bluegrass region of Kentucky, and later its mountain region, and scon we are in the hills of West Virginia, and here we are on the historic soil of Old Virginia and within the gates of its capital -the city of Richmond. About thirty six years ago, a large company of men, "all dressed alike," found it a very difficult task to enter this same city. But they did enter, and they brought back the old flag, and under its starry folds there is no happier nor more loval people than the citizens of the Old Dominion. Her battlefields are the common heritage of a united country, and the graves of her fallen heroes are sacred alike to the patriots of the North and of the South. "We are not divided

"We are not divided All one people we;" One in flag and country; One in destiny.

We had long desired to be with the Virginia Disciples in one of their State Conventions, and were glad to accept a kind invitation from the State Board of Missions to address their convention which has just closed. We could not reach the convention, however, until Thursday morning, and shall not attempt to report it. Another hand will do that for our next issue. We must, however, say a few things about it. It was the unanimous judgment of the brethren of the state who were present, that it was decidedly the largest and best convention which the Disciples in the State have ever held. Of that we are not qualified to speak, but of this we are sure, we never attended a better convention anywhere, state or national. Indeed there were moments of spiritual exaltation and of religious fervor which we have seen equaled only a few times, if ever, in any of our religious conventions. We are bound to say that the loftiest of these Pentecostal heights were reached in that part of the convention which was under the auspices of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. And this, too, in a state where it was thought, a few years ago, that our Christian women to-day should "keep silent in the churches," just as the apostle enjoined upon the women of the churches of Greece, nineteen centuries ago.

Some features of special interest were the presence and addresses of Rev. Charles Sheldon, known to the world as the author of "In His Steps," and Miss Bessie Farrar, returned missionary from India, whose home was here in Richmond. We had heard Mr. Sheldon before, but never before realized so fully his power. He is a modest, unpretentious man who requires a congenial atmosphere to be at his best. He found this in his Richmond audience. He remarked to some one, privately, that he sometimes had to thaw the ice out of his audience, but that here he found it en rapport with him from the start. He said to the writer in a personal interview that our people seemed to understand him and what he was aiming at better than most others. His address was so simple that a child would have been interested in it, and yet it was full of power and profoundly moved his audience. Let us have him address our Minneapolis convention on "How to Make this a Better World." Miss Farrar has an extraordinary gift, which seems to be a gift of the Holy Spirit, in conveying to her audience a living picture of actual scenes and incidents in the mission field. She draws her pictures with the skill of an artist, and vet with transparent artlessness. We have never known an audience more deeply stirred than hers was by the simple recital of facts and incidents in her own experience in India. We regret she is to return to the mission field before having an opportunity to address one of our national conventions, or to visit many of our churches. Bro. Stevens, missionary to Japan, was also present, but had only a few minutes to speak before the convention. He is to occupy the pulpit of Bro. Morgan, of the Seventh St. Church, in this city, on Lord's day. He represents our foreign society, as Miss Farrar does the C. W. B. M.

The membership of the churches known as Christian, in Virginia, is said to be about 20,000. And yet the amount of money raised by the State Co-operation last year, was considerably over $5,000, or about the same sum raised by our Missouri State Cooperation. In addition to this, the ladies of the C. W. B. M. raised about $2,000 for the permanent endowment of the Virginia State University Bible Chair, at an expense of $1.98, and about $1,500 for the general fund, besides over $300 for state development. They have seventy-two auxiliaries in the The endowment fund for the Bible Chair has already reached $20,000 and will ultimately reach $50,000. This was the project of the late and the lamented John B. Cary, of Richmond, who remembered it generously in his will, and whose son and daughters have it on their hearts to carry it on to completion in co-operation with the national Board of the C. W. B. M. Bro. Cary's influence is yet a potent factor in all the enterprises of the brotherhood of the state. Bro. C. A. Young, who delivered some helpful Bible lectures for the convention, reported also the progress of his work in connection with the Bible Chair at the University, and gave an encouraging outlook for that enterprise.

We cannot mention particular addresses of the convention, where all were so excellent. What impressed us most was the flavor of spirituality in all the speeches and prayers. We believe, in this respect, the brethren in many of the other states might profit from the example of our Virginia brethren. It was delightful and spiritually uplifting to be in their fellowship. A pleasing incident of the convention was the arrival on the last day, "that great day of the feast," of J. Z. Tyler, with his wife and little Mary. Brother Tyler was for many years pastor of the Seventh Street Church, where the convention was held, and has left an indelible mark of his personality upon it. Of course he received such an ovation as would delight the heart of any pastor, and the same was true of his wife. They are greatly loved here. Brother T. made a happy little speech, reporting himself very slowly improving. This was the longest journey he has made for more than a year. How good it is for a preacher to live so purely, so unselfishly, and give himself so unreservedly to the building up of the spiritual life of a church, that when he returns to an old field of labor he can receive such manifestations of Christian affection!

These lines are written in the home of Carey E. Morgan, present pastor of this mother church of Richmond. We are abiding in his home over Lord's day, and will speak for the Methodist brethren in the morning and occupy his pulpit in the evening. No lovelier man and no lovelier family have ever shared their home with us. Happy church to have such a pastor! Happy pastor to have such a church! Brother Morgan has already gotten a deep hold on the hearts of this people, and Sister Morgan, who is a genuine assistant pastor, is equally strong in her work and equally The churches of Richmond and loved. Manchester gave splendid meals in the basement of the church, by turns, all free. But there is no need to speak of Virginia hospitality. It was a great convention, a memorable one, and it is believed that it will mark a new era of growth and progress for our cause in the State. May it be so, and may the example of Virginia stimulate us all to aspire to higher and better things.

We go from here to Augusta, Ga., to attend another one of our Southern Conventions, where we expect another season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Concerning it we shall have something to say next week.

Richmond, Va., Nov. 17, 1900.

Yale University has offered to give free tuition to five Filipinos to be selected by Judge Taft, head of the Philippine Commission. This is a proper and commmendable move. It will be a good thing for the selected Filipinos, if they can pass the entrance examinations, and it will be a good thing for the University. It remains to be seen whether the guerrilla method of warfare which is especially in vogue among the Filipinos as we know them, can be adapted to use on the foot ball field. The thought is suggested by Yale's victory of 29 to 5 over Princeton last Saturday and her impending game with Harvard. Next year the Filipinos may figure. The "half devil-and-half-child" temperament ought to make its mark on the grid-iron.

THE CHRIST IN CONTRAST-II.

W. J. LHAMON.

THE CLAIMS OF JESUS.

Within the limits of our humanity Jesus claims to be precisely what we all are. We see him pictured here in the pages of our New Testaments as a babe, a youth and a young man. He hungers and thirsts, he sleeps and wakes, he rejoices and weeps, he has his questions and conclusions and he is subject to growth in wisdom and stature. In Nazareth he is called "the carpenter's son," and they say, "is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?" He travels with a company of his relatives and townsmen to Jerusalem to worship; he returns and is subject to Joseph and Mary; he is baptized at the hands of John, and is tempted in the wilderness; for a season he moves as a brother and friend among his disciples and companions; he has his career as a political and religious teacher; he is rejected by his nation, denied by his disciples, crucified under Pontius Pilate and buried in Joseph's new tomb. In every possible way he identifies himself with us. Surely "he was made of the seed of David according to the flesh." Surely his hand is like my hand and thine, and surely his soul is the soul of a brother. He is human, so human that our human hearts beat high for him. He is "the word made flesh." He sits at our feasts; he weeps at our graves; he knows all about our prodgals and their fathers; our rich men and bur beggars; our Levites and our Samaritans; he comes into our synagogues and worships with us, and looks into our temples to see whether we have made them dens of thieves. In every way he is a man. "He takes not on him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham." He has compelled us to believe that he is a man.

He is the only one who has had so great difficulty in convincing us that he is really a brother to us. But when we think about it, when we really stop to think, we must conclude that it is as difficult for the God Christ to convince us of his manhood as for the man Christ to convince us of his Godhood. We have never doubted that Cæsar was a man, or Plato, or Baddha, or Confucius. These mortals have had no difficulty in convincing their fellow mortals that they too were indeed mortals. In the eyes of history Cæsar has never been in danger of being mistaken for a god; and Plato is only a philosopher; and Buddha and Confucius did not claim to be more than men, and did not live in a fashion other than that of man. None of these great ones have been vexed with the problem of convincing the world that they were indeed men. On the contrary the world has refused to believe anything else about them. It is true that this or that Cæsar may have been idolized, and that since his death Buddha has been canonized among other Buddhas and classed among the innumerable idols of the East, and that Confucius is worshiped by a nation that is capable of fetich worship and animal worship and ancestor worship and any conceivable sort of worship. We are not dealing here with the superstitious process of deifying an ox or an emperor, a mound of mud or a human being, regardless of ethical and intellectual character and in defiance of every rational claim upon the qualities of deity. Our theme carries us above that.

We return, therefore, to say, in spite of the fact that many a great teacher, and many a noble or ignoble ruler, has had his apotheosis, none of them has been confronted with the problem of proving that he was human. Jesus on the contrary is so high above us thut we wonder whether he can be one of us. He is so pure that we wonder how he could dwell in the midst of our impurity; so exalted as seemingly to forbid condescension to our humility; and so utterly foreign to us as to make his nativity among us very strange indeed. Yet he has compelled us to say of him,

"And so the word had breath, and wrought With human hands the creed of creeds In loveliness of perfect deeds."

The man ward claims of Jesus are the more remarkable in that he assumes a full and complete humanity. Others might call him the son of David, he called himself "the Son of man," using the generic term in preference to any specific or ethnic one. Eighty times at least in the New Testament he appropriates this term to himself, or it is applied to him. He was seemingly fond of it as he was of no other. He made use of it under the most trying circumstances, and frequently sought to impress its fulness of meaning upon his disciples.

Plainly, according to this designation of himself, Jesus is more than a son of Abraham, he is more than Jew, more than Greek, more than Roman-he is nothing less than man. In his loves and longings, in his prayers and plannings, in his freedom from the incidental and his devotion to the universal, he is a man. "Moses for a people; Christ for the world," was the impassioned cry of Pascal. The cry applies to the whole list of ethnic leaders, who may be classed with Moses but not with Christ. Buddha may be the "Light of Asia," or the night, he is not the "Light of the world." Confucius abides in China, smitten with the limitations of a "celestial." Mohammed "went forth conquering and to conquer," with the sword. But now he has retreated into Asia for the most part and is rapidly dying. Let him be the prophet of God or not, he has his limitations as compared with "the Son of Man," who once stood ready to die rather than to kill, and who disarmed his own disciple, saving, "He that takes the sword shall perish with the sword.

To lay claim to a universal style of manhood in the days of Jesus was more difficult by far than it would be at present. Then men were not modified by travel and study and intercommunication as they are now. The universal ideal was not, and if it had been it would not have seemed admirable to such as prided themselves on being Greeks, or Romans, or "children of Abraham." Jesus had first to create that ideal, then he had to realize it in his life and teaching; he had also to suffer for it, and wait through all these centuries to see it become desirable in the eyes of even the foremost men, not to speak of the multitudes of them. But now the real students of his claims are beginning to see how effectually he lays his hand upon Jew and Gentile alike and makes them one in him. When we remember that Jesus was a Jew and then reflect that to-day the foremost Christian nations are Anglo-Saxon; when we see the story of his life triumphant over the souls of men of every tribe and tongue and kindred and people and nation; when we see men that are daring and women that are gentle bowing alike in adoration before him. and little children flocking to him, and aged people reposing in him, we begin to appreciate and to admire the universality of his claims and the fulnss of his humanity. Rightfully and with gracious and far-reaching purpose he named himself "the Son of Man.'

On the contrary, Confucius claims to be not so much as a prophet even, but only a historian. Buddha claims to be one among other Buddhas. His state was for him the final incarnation preceding Nirvana, the lapse into the infinite when e he came. He did not aspire to universality but to the end of conscious existence. Mohammed claimed to be one among many prophets of God. Even from that claim he fell. The prophet turned soldier and indulged himself in the ambition, the avarice and the lust of the average first-class military man. Plato and Socrates are high type Greeks with no special claims beyond their intellectual precedence, unless we make an exception of the latter, who thought himself now and again under the influence of a demon. But how infinitely this falls below the level of our Lord! If we turn from the list of great Gentiles to the greatest among the Hebrews we find Moses saying, "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you;" and John the Baptist saying of the Christ, "He must increase but I must decrease."

SOME MODERN OCCULT FADS-I.

BY W. E. HARLOW.

In dealing with the above subject I am well aware of the importance of being understood, and hence I shall endeavor to use only such words and phrases as will be comprehended by the many and not the few. Occultism means, primarily, hidden, secret and unknown, and as I shall class "Christian Science," "Dowieism," "Spiritism," and the so-called modern "Faith Cure" under the title of these articles, it will be at once observed how difficult the task. These pseudo philosophies are here brethren, and all the ridicule and denunciation and attributing them to the devil will never stop their onward march while they continue to make their cures by the thousands. We must meet them with facts and not fun; with religion and not railing; with science and not sentiment, and it is to this end that I have consented to contribute, after several years of patient research and experiment, a few articles for this pape. From a theoretical standpoint I shall follow the hypothesis formulated by Mr. Hudson in his Law of Psychic Phenomena, because, whether true or false, it appears to be true in my own personal experiments, and I shall not attempt to reply to any man who has not under favorable conditions put it into practical experience. Our Maker has endowed us with reason and assigned us a noble and intelligent rank in the scale of intellectual and moral being, and as he has commanded us to use this faculty, so I may with justice remark, that he who cannot reason is a fool; he who dare not reason is a coward; he who will not reason is a bigot; but he who can and dare reason is a man. By so doing and daring to think for myself I am well aware that I assume no very enviable position as regards popularity.

Independent thought and fearless expression have ever drawn forth the scoffs and sneers of that portion of our race who have adopted, without investigation, the scientific opinion of others. I refer to those only who have received their ideas from others by inheritance as they did their real estate; for the one they never labored and for the other they never thought. If no human being had dared to hazard the expression of an original thought, then nothing in the realms of science would have been disclosed by speech, nor penned in books. It is by daring to step aside from the beaten track of tradition, and bringing forth from the dark arcana of nature into the light of day some new truth, that we add our mite to the common stock of knowledge already accumulated. The truths that God has established inherent in nature are not only infinitely diversified, but are at the same time immutable and eternal. No possible addition can be made to their number, nor is it in the power of man to create or annihilate a single truth in the empire of nature. That there is a residuam of truth in all these "oc cult fads" no student of psychic science will for a moment question. It takes some truth to bolster up so much error. It exists independent of our belief or unbelief, and all we can do is to search it out and bring it forth from darkness to the light of day. And he who has the magnanimity to do this, so far from being persecuted and opposed, should be sustained and encouraged as the benefactor of his race. It is my purpose now to show that the success of the modern occult propagandist does not depend upon some inherent force or power, neither does it belong to the supernatural. And I might add here that it does not emanate from his Satanic Majesty. Whatever may be his belief he has stumbled onto a natural law, and his success is measured by his conformity to the conditions of that law. That law is pyschology, the science of the mind.

"As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," is being constantly proven true. If a man believes himself to be sick, he will, by his own thought, produce in himself physical changes corresponding to the nature of the disease he believes himself to be suffering from. The treatment of disease by psychological processes may be summarized thus: Thoughts are things; change the thought and benefit will ensue. Let us begin at the beginning and show what scientific warrant we have for our declaration that the mind of man is powerful enough, when properly directed, to control certain forms of disease. We can follow out our argument without diverging from the question as it applies to the healing art.

It is now many years since the pilgrim in search of health made his journey to Lourdes, France, in the hope that by the healing grace of the saint he worshiped he might be healed of his bodily infirmity. Wonderful, indeed, to witness or to read of, are the now yearly pilgrimages to that shrine of the halt, the blind and the sick, and still more wonderful to those who are ignorant of the principles at work are the remarkable cures which result from that journey. It has been estimated that ten per cent. of the so-called incurable cases have yielded to the healing power of the shrine. Is this, then, an evidence of a miracle? By no means. It matters very little whether the particular "charm" which works the cure is in the form of a glass of consecrated water, a piece of wood, a block of stone, a finger-bone of a saint, or a living being, the point to note is, that a very large percentage of the so-called miracles are actually wrought, and that, apparently, through personal contact with the

But we find also that when a piece of ordinary wood was substituted, without the knowledge of the suppliant, for a supposed fragment of the true cross in the Geneva Monastery, there was no abatement of the cures or miracles. So that from these and a dozen other known facts we gather this scientific truth: the healing virtue does not rest in the relic, but in the attitude of mind of the sufferer. Faith worketh marvels truly, but faith alone is not sufficient for all things in this materialistic age.

In face of the fact that some are healed by faith and some are not, theory falls to the ground and we must deal with the facts as we find them. In these cures by faith there is no evidence of the transmission of divine power from the relic or agent to the sufferer. There is no evidence of a miracle. A miracle is something super-natural, something beyond the pale of natural law. Do we know of any example in which the laws of nature were arbitrarily thrust aside? I refer now especially to the miracles of healing. Did not the Great Healer himself demand that in those he healed the conditions of faith, or expectancy of relief, should be present? How often do we find that quality 'faith' the condition, the essential condition, upon which the wonder depended! We quote a few examples: "Thy faith hath made thee whole," "According to thy faith be it unto thee," "O thou of little faith," "I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel." "And he did not many miracles there because of their unbelief." From these it would seem that the condition of mind of the sufferer is a very potent factor in establishing or removing a disease.

In carefully diagnosing the cases treate

by miracle workers, metaphysicians as mental healers of all kinds, we come upo these important facts: Firstly, they ca and do cure similar ailments in different pe ple by entirely different modes of trea ment, and in using the word "ailments" w do not mean thereby merely hysterical di eases. Secondly, they do not perform a cu until the mind of the patient is brought b prayer, communion, thought, or readin into a condition of hope, merging in the conviction of faith. There are ca tain medicines which are a help to th sick, and in their physiological actio upon all temperaments are uniform and sa utary. To refuse to employ medicine of an kind is the height of folly and is the wea spot in the armor of the mental healer. I refuse to acknowledge the power of the min when properly directed by scientific meth ods, is the weakness of the duly qualifie physician, and not all his knowledge of med icine, anatomy, surgery and physiology ca compensate for his ignorance of psychology At the present time there is no school c healing which is not based upon the truth of psychology, not one which psycholog does not embrace and envelope. It is th Aaron's rod of medical science and, couple with the judicious employment of medicine it is more effective in the treatment of dis ease than any other method known to mar There is no muscle or nerve in the huma body which cannot be brought under the at solute control of the mind. We will, in ou next article, give the functions of the minand their scientific application to the cur of disease.

THE CHURCH IN THE TWEN-TIETH CENTURY.

O. B. STOCKFORD.

I.

In order to study our future we mus understand our progress in the truth and th present state of the world.

Knowledge respecting the latter is not cessary in order that we may know the problems which will demand of the church solution in the near future.

Josiah Strong, in his admirable work "The New Era," calls the nineteenth century one of preparation. And the great discoveries and reforms of the last hundred years certainly forecast a state of society during the twentieth century differing from that of this or any preceding age.

The recent inventions which make the intercourse of the peoples of the world much easier than ever before, and the social, industrial, educational and political changes which have lately taken place render the improvement or degradation of mankind not only possible but certain. And it would appear that the century is anxious to extend, in her last moments, this preparatory work as far as possible. Of the political life of Japan, China, Africa and the new colonial possessions of the United States this is especially true.

The study of the material progress of the race forms a necessary introduction to the consideration of our subject. But it is not ny intention to discuss such progress just now. I desire merely to call attention to it. With the Disciples of Christ, also, this has been a century of preparation. The Campbells and their fellow-laborers aimed at a eturn in doctrine and life to the teaching nd practice of the church in the beginning. careful study of our history, however, will how that we have by no means come up to he standard set before us. We have, it is rue, made substantial progress in some repects. Our leading thinkers, for instance, ave placed before the world a clear exposiion of the first principles of the gospel; and ur practice as well as our teaching in this articular is supported by God's word. But the discharge of some of our duties we ave not, as a body, made even an effort.

I think our pioneers in striving to return scriptural teaching took the right course then they began with the elucidation of first rinciples. The laws of admission to the ingdom naturally demand first consideraion. A correct understanding of them is ecessary in order fully to comprehend the uman side of the plan of salvation. A comlete submission to Christ in the practice of hem necessarily precedes the full enjoyment f the privileges and duties of the Christian -duties and privileges to which they, by od's grace, admit us. The greater portion f our strength is probably due to our loy-Ity to the Lord in respect to these doctrines. But while the proper presentation and ractice of first principles is of supreme nportance we should not so dwell upon nem as to neglect other truth. Neverthess many of our brethren speak and write s though the New Testament teaching on his subject contained all things necessary b the solution of the great question of hristian union. Now, it is evident that we annot have true union merely by submitting b part of Christ's law. This great object an only be accomplished through an honest fort to realize the whole mission of the hurch-to obtain co-operation of members all good work. Strictly speaking, there an be no such union as taught in the New estament between those who have not beyed Christ in first principles. The quesion of union is based upon doctrines which ollow those by which we are brought into he body of Christ.

П

Denunciation of sectarianism was, until ecently, peculiar to the Disciples. Even o-day aggressiveness along this line is almost one of the distinctive features of our eaching. Certainly no other body so inelligently and fearlessly proclaims its sinulness.

But there is danger that we may ourelves become sectarian through the narrow onception we entertain of what true union onsists in.

The teaching and practice of error are not y any means the only causes of division in he Church of Christ. Mere neglect to each or apply a portion of the truth is also ivisive in its nature. Indeed it would apear that narrowness is the root of almost ll division. The chief cause of sectarianism seems to be the failure of Christians to appropriate the whole truth. In this way fallacies of a positive as well as a negative nature arise. For this failure has given rise to undue stress being laid upon favored portions of Scripture; thus causing erroneous teaching and practice as well as neglect of truth. While we cannot study any portion of God's Word too earnestly, yet we will fail to understand it through narrow, self-willed consideration. We can never comprehend the truth by accepting only sections of it. By such a course not only is the preferred portion wrenched, but other phases of the same truth are denied. The only way to avoid denominationalism is to strive to know and practice the whole truth.

Had Calvinists fully considered those Scriptures which reveal the universal scope of the plan of salvation, Calvinism would never have been framed. Had Universalists conscienti usly studied those passages of God's Word which plainly refer to his elect and the laws of admission to his kingdom, Universalism would never have been taught. The exclusive advocacy of pet theories, whether drawn up into written statements or not, have necessarily, a contracting influence. And this narrowness has become just as prominent in the practical side of Christianity as in the doctrinal.

A church can no more be absolutely perfect than the members of which she is composed can be. But she can possess the spirit of per'ection. And this spirit calls for more than a rejection of all uninspired creeds and the acceptance, in theory, of the Bible as our only guide. It will lead the members to an honest effort to carry out the whole mission of the church-to co-operate in all good work. We should not be content to merely keep within the bounds of truth. We should strive to practice the whole truth. It is only when a body has such an aim that it is free from sectarianism; for a wider or less broad purpose will not be strong enough to include all Christian workers.

We must not only try to break down error but aim to build up the truth in every way. We should not be content with being a negative force respecting erroneous teaching; but should endeavor as far as possible to be a positive force in relation to all good works. Indeed by the latter course we will the more effectually accomplish the former. Unless we use our power as an organization more effectively against the evils of society we will degenerate into a sect. Our fight for sound doctrinal principles may excuse our slow progress in practical work in the past; but it cannot in the future.

Ш

The chief weakness of the Disciples of Christ appears to be their failure to comprehend the importance of the latter portion of the great commission: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." In our consideration of this command we must bear in mind the truth of the words with which our Savior prefaced it: "All power in heaven and in earth is given to me."

The Christian's duty to preach the gospel to the world seems to be fairly well understood. But our responsibility as a church, in building up social and national life—in elevating mankind and removing obstacles to conversion is not so fully realized. Yet such work is included under Christ's commandments. In the sermon on the mount our Savior refers to his disciples as "the salt of the earth," and "the light of the world." If we are true Disciples, therefore, we will be a potent force for good in the world—an uplifting power in all human activities. Our Savior undoubtedly intends us to preserve a saving and enlightening relationship toward all matters which concern humanity.

The trouble with us is that we do not feel as much as we should our responsibility as a church. Too much stress is not laid upon individual duty. But our chief neglect is in respect to those duties which require collective effort. We have yet to learn the great power of co-operative work in those occupations and interests which are known as secular. Were we able to show the world an example of fellowship in daily life, of united effort to purify political affairs, and of conscientious co operation in elevating our social, industrial and educational systems we would greatly benefit the world and do much toward accomplishing the purpose for which our congregational organizations exist.

Our mission as a church is almost as wide as our duty as Christians. Every good work which requires co-operation demands the aid of the church. We are taught, through the New Testament, that we have duties as citizens and as members of society. Much of that which is connected with these duties can be effectually accomplished only through united effort. Had Christians, as a church. thrown their weight into much-needed reforms we would not have the selfish, corrupt systems that now exist, and the kingdom of God would be much more extensive. One of the characteristics of the kingdom is righteousness. Do we carry this into all phases of our life? Our Savior came "that they might have life and that they might have it more a bundantly." Are we his disciples if we permit a state of affairs that is crushing the life out of people?

Our leaders frequently state that Christian union will solve all our present-day problems. But this is beginning at the wrong end. We will never have true union until we assume all our responsibility respecting the world. Nor need we think we possess the ground of such union unless we are striving to do all the Church of Christ should do. Divisions to-day arise as much out of lack of practical work as out of difference of opinions on doctrinal subjects.

There appears to be no body which is endeavoring to accomplish the complete mission of the church. The Disciples of Christ are strong in first principles and evangelization. The Quakers and similar bodies excel in simplicity of life. The Free Methodists take a creditable part in social and political reforms. The Episcopalians delight in the intellectual features of religion. The Mormons, though clinging to some vicious practices, furnish us with a good example of industrial co-operation. Some bodies emphasize the practical side of Christianity, while others exalt the spiritual. While every sect possesses some truth, the narrow manner in which they study God's Word causes them to see even their favorite theme in a wrong light.

The time has arrived when all the church must strive to unite all the excellences of pure religion. Socialists and skeptics are not only charging us with inability to improve present conditions, but they are seeking themselves to relieve society. If the church does not become more aggressive along the lines above referred to, Christianity must greatly suffer. I believe, however, that the close of the next century will see a united church working on all lines for the upbuilding of the race.

As the Disciples of Christ were foremost in advocating Christian union during the present century, let us not be backward during the next one hundred years in practicing those things which make for it. This must be our aim if we desire to remain unsectarian.

HOW TO STUDY THE PSALMS.*

BY B. A. ABBOTT.

The book of Psalms is at once the easiest and the hardest portion of Scriptures to study satisfactorily-easy, because, for the most part, the style is clear and the themes of a practical and experimental nature; difficult, because of the inexhaustible treasures of thought and suggestion they contain. Hooker says: "What is there necessary for man to know which the Psalms are not able to teach?" and Bishop Horne says: "The Psalms are an epitome of the Bible adapted to the purposes of devotion." Stanley calls them "a Bible within a Bible; in which most of the peculiarities, inward and outward, of the rest of the sacred volume are concentrated." In them every angel of joy and sorrow sweeps the chords of the heart.

1. The first thing essential to a proper understanding of the Psalms is to remember that they are the hymnal of the Hebrew people. The name by which they are usually designated in the Hebrew is "Book of Praises." Some are called "Prayers of David." The collection consists of 150 compositions, and these are divided into five books (see Revised Version). This distribution of the Psalms is very old, and is not chronological nor even logical nor vital, but seems to have been determined either by related theological ideas or literary form, or by being collected in different times or by different persons. The Psalms are full of the religious passion that can only be fittingly expressed in music. They are therefore to be studied and used largely as we use our hymns of to-day. And this has indeed been one of their chief services through the ages.

2. It is impossible to fully appreciate the Psalms without knowing the historical background upon which they rest, and the trials and struggles out of which they were born. They are the heart history of an earnest people in their loftiest and most earnest moods. They are the elite thought of the elite people of an elite nation. One must be familiar with the history of Israel, at least from the crossing of the Red Sea till the end of the exile, before the full meaning of the Psalms will dawn upon him. The whole story of Israel's life, inner and outer, is in the Psalms. No nation ever had such terrible trials of faith as Israel, none ever experienced such puzzling providences, none ever had so much reason both to doubt and believe; and, on the whole, none ever held to their faith with a more desperate and sublime constancy. The vicissitudes of the people of Israel are the road to the heart of the Psalms. If it is a sinuous way to follow, it is lighted up by divine revela-

3. Having seen that the Psalms are the consummate flowers of the religious experience of the people of Israel, the student will be prepared to examine the compositions separately in substance, form, and history. Space forbids an exhaustive arrangement here, and surely the analysis of each is not to be thought of; but we may point out roughly the following: Psalms that contain or are prayers, including nearly every form of petition, 3-7, 11, 13, 16, 17, 20, 22, 25, 27, 28, 31, 32, 35, 38, 41-44, 51, 54-57, 59-64, 67, 69-71, 74, 77, 79, 80, 83, 84, 86, 88, 89, 94, 102, 109, 120, 122, 123, 130, 132, 137, 140 144; psalms of thanksgiving, 9, 18, 22, 30, 34, 40, 45, 48, 65, 66 68, 75, 76, 81, 84, 98, 103, 105, 108, 116, 118, 124, 126, 129, 135, 136, 138, 149; psalms on the goodness and mercy of God, 23, 34, 36, 91, 100, 103, 107, 117, 121, 145, 146; psalms on the power and majesty of God, 8, 19, 24, 29, 33, 47, 50, 65, 66, 76, 77, 93, 95-97, 99, 104, 111, 113-115, 134, 139, 147, 148, 150; psalms on different classes of men, with their respective rewards, 1, 5, 7, 9, 10-12, 14-17, 24, 25, 32, 34, 36, 37, 50, 52, 53, 58, 73, 75, 84, 91, 92, 94, 112, 119, 121, 125, 127, 128, 133; on God's law, psalms 19, 119; on the vanity of human life, 39, 49, 90; advice to rulers, 82, 101; on humility, 131; prophetical psalms, 2, 16, 22, 40, 45, 68, 72, 87, 101, 118; and historical psalms. 78, 105, 106. This classification gives only the leading ideas. Many other thoughts could be gathered from each, and some subjects run through them all, like veins of gold in the heart of the hills.

4. Hence the Psalms may be studied topically. It is here especially that we find ourselves unable to be exhaustive. Here is work for a lifetime. Here we find treated the creation of the world, the great questions of God's providence and the economy of grace; the spiritual meaning of the history of Israel; repentance and forgiveness; the sufferings and victories of David; the prophecies of the Messiah; the firm establishment of God's power in the world, and the final overthrow of the wicked. Nor do subjects and themes stop here, for in the Psalms, the first place in the Old Testament, we have the clearest and strongest intimations of immortality, notably in psalms 16 and 17, which "bear witness to a perfectly developed consciousness of immortality in the writer," and scattered through them may be found single verses which shine like the calm, peaceful stars in a winter night, prophesying the future life where the soul "will see light in God's light." A fascinating line of study is Christ in the Psalms, the basis of this study being psalms 22, 45 and 110. Studied thus topically we would have the best view to be found in the Old Testament of the development of doctrine, ethics, and spiritual feeling. And it may be said that the Psalms must be studied to fully understand Christian doctrine, for they have so permeated Christian thought and affected the Christian consciousness that their influence has been vast in church history. Also, if we would study the blessedness of public worship we must not overlook the Psalms. They are full of enthusiasm for God's house.

5. The Psalms are to be studied with supreme reference to the spiritual life. Setting forth as they do every conceivable experience of the soul of man in his various relations and obligations, they become the best available guides to holiness. Doubtless it is right to study this portion of God's word critically as literature, and as sparks of light thrown off in the movements of life, thus coming to them in the philosophic spirit, but we will only get the best from them when we come with the religious motive. The Psalms are the devotional book of the world. They were drawn forth from sincere and often troubled hearts by the spirit of God, and the study of them will help lead our hearts to the God who alone can give them rest. They are the struggle of man's religious feelings to find God. Few books in the Bible are so well calculated to cure the religious man of pessimism and doubt. Recognizing all that is bad in society and the individual, yet the darkest cloud is made resplendent with an undying optimism. Says Reuss: "The psalmists seek God and know where to find him; the prophets for the most part address men who have forgotten him." The spiritual power of the Psalms is to be judged from the use made of them by Christ and the apostles, and holy and devout men and wo nen since. Jesus quoted from the book of Psalms when he was dying on the cross. A book of devotion, the Psalter is also a book of consolation and inspiration. "The God who is the Speaker in the Pentateuch is the Listener in the Psalms;" and that means answered prayer. The Psalms show us that a man may dare to tell God all that is in his heart. And that is the sweet story of childtrust and Father-love. Under the breath of the Spirit of God, the music from David's "mystic harp" soothes all, cheers all, inspires all, cleanses all.

6. The problem of the so-called imprecatory psalms (such as 59, 60, 79, 109 and 137) deserves a more extended notice than we can here give it. I believe the true explanation of them is that they are intended to set forth the principle of the supreme repugnance of good to evil. God cannot tolerate evil. If these psalms seem to be contrary to the love of God, we must remember that God's wrath is a form of love, and therefore in the moral government of the world, a measure of mercy.

- 7. Among the many fruitful subjects for special study we may infer from the Psalms we mention:
- (1) The doctrine of nature. Some of the psalms might be termed nature psalms. According to the psalmist there is spiritual law in the natural world, and with nature as a symbol or revelation or parable or selfutterance of the Divine, we may read the goodness of God.
- (2) Here is, again, a philosophy of history. The true way to read history is from the religious standpoint. True history is the story of the government of God.
- (3) The Psalms suggest the place of music in public worship and in spiritual culture, a subject that has never been adequately treated. In this life we have few better revelations of heaven than that given in Wed words and melody and you give wings to the soul.
- (4) A fresh study of the Psalms will suggest to us a reconsideration of the most effective forms and methods of conducting worship in the house of God.
- (5) There is no better place to study the meaning and nature of inspiration than in the Psalms. Inspiration is more than genius. Genius comes to its full under the touch of inspiration. Inspiration and art are related. Art is, or at least if no more, may be, the result and servant of inspiration. Inspiration gives the diamond in the rough, art polishes it till it flashes before men.
- (6) Revelation may also be studied well in the light of the Psalms, where it will be seen that experience is usually the pathway of revelation. The common law of revelation is duty-doing.
- 8. What are a few helps to the study of the Psalms? No part of the Bible has been written upon so profusely, and on the whole so unsatisfactorily. Among accessible helps we would note in the Bethany Reading Courses: "A Guide to Bible Study," by Prof. McGarvey, chapters 4-12; and "The Prophets of Israel," by H. L. Willett. Others are the preface to Bishop Horne's Commentary on the Psalms; introduction to the Psalms in the "Speakers' Commentary;" Delitzsch's Commentary; Stanley's "History of the Jewish Church," Lec. 25; "The Origin and Growth of the Psalms," by Murray; "The Poetry and the Religion of the Psalms," by James Robertson, D. D.; "The Life of David in the Psalms," by Alexander McLaren, D. D., in the "Expositor's Bible" series. is a very interesting little book by Henry Van Dyke on some of the psalms, and "The Psalms in History and Biography," by Dr. John Ker, will help the student to realize the wonderful value and power of this divine old hymnal.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

MY BELATED HOLIDAY.

Bro. Garrison, when you were reveling in the lacustrine delights of your beloved Macatawa I was riveted to my duties in London. during one of the hottest seasons we have ever known. But the laws of compensation are not exhausted. They have come into play once more. Now you are pinned down to the pivot on which you must dutifully revolve, and I, for a brief period, am luxuriating in the dolce non far niente of an Italian holiday. That old pagan poet, Lucretius, who dwelt and wrote in the fair Italy I have been traversing, expatiates, in a celebrated passage, on the joy of walking safely on the top of some cliff while seeing other people drowning in a storm. He was an old heathen and knew no better. But had he been a Christian he would still, perhaps, have been guilty of feeling the luxury of a holiday enhanced by the reflection that others are toiling on. However, I must improve even on that sort of cynicism by expressing a wish that here, where I write this letter, I could have with me a large party of all my best friends in the world.

IN VIEW OF ÆTNA.

Across the Italian garden where I am penning these paragraphs, and over a great stretch of vine, orange, almond, lemon and olive groves, soars the most majestic of volcanoes in Europe. Nature effloresces at his feet and his flanks are trellised with an overflowing harvest of fruit, even along many of the old lava torrents. Somewhere on the other side of the mountain smokes the fumario perpetuo, the crater which is always more or less in action as a safety-valve. That I shall see from Catania to-morrow; but at this moment I am at Taormina, sixty miles from Messina, on the eastern shore of the island. Taormina is one of the most beautifully situated towns in Europe. It is one of the most superb spots in this great island of countless enchantments. If any reader wants to know what Sicily means what a feast it spreads for the student, the artist, the Christian, the tourist, and the overworked toiler seeking rest, let him, if he cannot come here, read the most interesting book I have seen on the subject. It is written by Dr. Paton, an American, and therefore should be easily accessible. The title is "Picturesque Sicily." The island has an area of 10,000 square miles and contains three and half millions of people. It is crammed with historical evidences, for it has been in possession of the Siculi, Carthagenians, Romans, Saracens, Normans, French, Germans and Italians. Now it is part of free and independent Italy. It is a tangled mass of glorious mountains of which Ætna is king. It is a perfect paradise of archæology and architecture, and any cultured visitor will derive unparalleled pleasure from a visit to Messina, Taormina, Catania, Syracuse, Girgenti, Marsala, Segesta and Palermo. I find that especially Americans seem to come under the spell of this Sicilian enchantment. Some, for instance, each season come to Taormina or Palermo for the first time.

They intend to stay a week and they linger on and on for three months. They cannot tear themselves away. I consider their conduct wise, especially if they are observant and thoughtful people and not mere superficial sybarites.

"THE SOUTH WIND BLEW SOFTLY."

At length I have discovered what Paul really alluded to in that sentence in his account in the Acts of the Apostles of his shipwreck. When he says "the south wind blew softly" he must be alluding to the scirocco. I used to think that the people of South Italy, Sicily and Malta would find the soft blowing of the south wind a delight in contrast with our savage hyperborean blasts. But I find that they detest the scirocco, because though it comes breathing with such soft seductiveness that the clouds seem stationary, the oleanders and cactus blossoms and olive leaves scarcely stir, and the air is balmy with fragrance of myriad blossoms, yet this element from the opposite African coast is simply the enervating current from the parched Sahara. Human nature is none the better for the influence of soft, warm surroundings. It is better for us to be subjected to environments of storm and battle than to be lapped in conditions of luxury. So I am glad I have presently to rush back northwards and to endure the chill and fog and frost of an English winter and to work under English conditions. The Italians are a noble race, but there is much in the atmospheric auspices under which they live to account for the fact that they, like the Greeks, have been eclipsed by the progress of the northern races.

WHAT I HEAR FROM ENGLAND.

Evidently we are on the eve of great developments of very decisive policy in England. The coming policy appears to me to be partly very good, partly very bad. Europe has this week experienced one of those shocks which Lord Salisbury periodically administers, and which prove that he is, at any rate, a great statesman, for whose Olympian nod the world is constrained to wait. The talk of Europe is the new rapprochement between England and Germany on the Eastern problem. I notice that the continental press is unusually agitated about the agreement that England and Germany shall keep open the Chinese commercial door. Russia is aghast; France is hysterical; Germany is profoundly gratified; Austria is pleased; Italy is delighted. Accounts which reach me from England seem to show that there is a mixed feeling. It is feared by some critics that Russia will once more take mortal offence at a step which will compel her either boldly to annex Manchuria or to withdraw her heavy hand from over that province. If Lord Salisbury has managed really to thwart Russia he has committed a huge diplomatic blunder. Russia will never loosen her hold on Manchuria. She will only tighten her grip. That I know. The evidence is easy to secure by anyone who knows Russia. I have little confidence in German diplomacy, for it is callous and selfish. The Kaiser is a better friend and warmer ally of the "Butcher of the Bosporus" than he is of his grandmother, Queen Victoria. If Lord Salisbury had sought an adhesion and understanding on the part of America to this "open door" policy, and had announced to the world that Britain and America would keep that door open in China, the result would have been ultimately far more gratifying than I, for one, am able to believe will be the outcome of this Anglo-German outcome. I fear that Lord Salisbury and the Kaiser mean to plunge more deeply into the Chinese bog. Absit omen!

Taormina, Sicily, Oct 28, 1900.

SWITZERLAND AND THE ALPS.

CHARLES REIGN SCOVILLE.

We left Paris at 9 a. m., Monday, September 10th, on a limited train, and fairly flew through beautiful and picturesque France. At first along the Seine, then leaving it we came late in the afternoon to the foothills, and by 6 o'clock we were lifting our eyes unto the everlasting hills and all were in ecstasies, when, much to our disappointment, darkness came on, leting the curtain fall on our beautiful mountain scenery. But as we were passing Lake of Neufchatel and Lake of Bienne, the moon arose in all her glory and the mountains and lakes by moonlight surpassed, if possible, the scene at sundown.

The quiet cities nestling on the bosom of the lake, folded in the arms of the mountains and wrapped in the robes of night, were an ideal expression of rest.

We reached Berne, the capitol city, at 10 p. m., and retired at the beautiful Bellevue Hotel.

Not on the pages of the historian, but beneath the surface of her lakes, are found the earliest records of human existence in this beautiful country now called Switzerland. The earliest inhabitants seem to have been a mysterious race who dwelt in houses reared on piles above the waters of the lakes, and who used instead of metal implements. Following this primeval race, history shows us the Rhaeti of Etruscan origin-retreating before Celtic Helvetii, and then in the first century of our era Rome comes upon the scene, subjugates the people, founds colonies, builds roads, spreads Latin civilization and holds dominion until her downfall. Next, the fierce, barbaric tribes swarmed in from overcrowded regions to which the Roman prowess had confined them, and the Goths, the fierce Alemanni, and the Burgundians became the conquerers and divided the country into three sections. The Franks next appear under Clovis, A. D. 496-534 culminating in the great empire of Charlemagne, who introduced the feudal system. In 1016 we find Switzerland under German dominion. Soon, the feudal lords grew more powerful and less mindful of imperial rule and the free towns, to preserve their liberties, were compelled to treat with the nobles, and the German yoke was thrown off. Following this came the Austrian contests to which the Tell legends belong (1307). For more than two hundred years Switzerland maintained the struggle for independence until Maximilian struck the final blow at Swiss independence in the Suabian war, 1499. But at the memorable battle of Dornach, where six thousand Swiss defeated fifteen thousand Austrians, the tide was turned and, in course of time, independence formally gained—1648.

Christianity had been disseminated among the Burgundians in the fifth century and among the Alemanni by Columbus and his disciples in the seventh century. The reformation of religion was commenced by the proclamation of the new doctrine at Zurich, 1523. Under the preaching of Zwingli, and later Calvin and Favel, a large per cent. of the people accepted Protestantism. In 1523 the Helvetic Confession of Faith was put forth and three wars (1531, 1653 and 1712) between Catholics and Protestants ensued.

In 1802 Bonaparte restored the cantonal system, and in 1815 the allied sovereigns acknowledged the independence of Switzerland.

"The Swiss people," says Laing, "are the Dutch of the mountains, the same cold, unimaginative, money seeking, yet vigorous, determined, energetic people. Lovers of freedom, with unbounded reverence for antiquity, and exceedingly reserved and exclusive in their social arrangements."

The government consists of a Federal Assembly made up of a National Council of 145, and a Council of States of 44 members, or two for each of the 22 cantons, or political divisions. The former has one delegate for every twenty thousand inhabitants. This assembly elects a Federal Council of 7 for three years, under a President and Vice-President, elected annually. A judicial body or Federal Tribun 1 is nominated for three years. Every male has the fran chise at the age of twenty, and is bound for military service. Switzerland is the smallest Republic, except one, in the world, having an area of only 16,000 square miles (about 206 by 139 miles at its greatest breadth) and with a population (1895) of only 3,100 000.

The surface varies from 800 feet on the Rhine at Basle to 15,830 feet, the summit of Mt. Blanc. More than half of the surface is occupied by the Alps, whose literary, legendary and historic lakes, such as Geneva, beggar description.

Berne was founded A. D. 1191, by Berchtold, Duke of Zahringen, from whom it derives its name, coat of arms, and the ever-present bear in all public places because of the founder's having slain one in the vicinity. The city is one of the most ancient in Europe, of which you are reminded at every turn by samps of past ages.

The houses are mostly of grey sandstone, with iron balconies so constructed as to form an arcade over the sidewalks. This has its advantages in bad weather, but renders the shops gloomy and has led to the practice of exposing the goods outside the stores, and if you do go in to purchase an article you must come to the light to select it.

The places of interest are—the city library with 90,000 volumes, the "Church of the Holy Ghost," a Gothic structure with a tower 360 feet high, begun in 1421, on the site of the older church of 1276; the Museum of Fine Arts; the Natural History Museum; the Cavalry Barracks and Military School; the Munster Platz (park); numerous fountains; the Bear Pit, and last and not least the famous Clock Tower. The following curious exhibition takes place when the clock strikes, "At three minutes before the hour a cock crows and flops his wings; presently some bears march in procession around an old man, and the cock crows again. Then a fool strikes the hour on the great bell with a hammer, whilst the old man checks off the strokes with his sceptre. and turns his hourglass. A bear nods approval and a final bout of cock crowing ends the performance." Do you wonder that I went to see this a second time and wanted to go again? At midnight I heard eleven different great clocks from the towers of the city strike. Early in the morning three shepherds, with as many dogs, passed my window with their sheep, and I was delighted to see the dogs do their work quickly, earnestly and perfectly. The sheep also seemed to equally understand and the shepherd was "going before." But I was surprised to see that more than half of the flock were black sheep and it is almost universal here.

We left Berne at 8:30 for Scherzligen, where we took the boat on beautiful Lake Thun, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, 2 miles broad, 1,800 feet above sea level and 702 feet deep. The water is so extremely clear that fish are visible to great depths. No view that I have ever had could equal this. On both sides of the lake rose the high Oberland Mountains, dotted with chalets, villas, villages and gardens, kept as beautifully as any city lawn. On the north side were the Bernese Alps with their glittering snow-fields, and on the southern shore the two isolated peaks-Mt. Niessen and Mt. Stockhorn, the former rising up like a vast, symmetrical, broad based pyramid; the other shooting out diagonally into the western sky its huge terminal horn, bold, bare and cloudcapped.

Steaming on we passed the cavern of St. Beatus in a perpendicular cliff which forms the base of the Beatenberg Mountain. Tradition says this saint, who dwelt in this cavern, was the first to introduce Christianity into these parts. A strange legend is reported, that "a dragon originally occupied the cave but was turned out much in the same way as St. Sabo ousted the lion, and that St. Beatus had accomplished the art of navigating the lake on his cloak without any external assistance."

We left the boat at Interlaken, beautifully situated among the mountains between the lakes, and were soon on our way up the valley to Grindelwald. On either side were mountains apparently more and more wonderful, and we were called quickly from one side of our car to the other as some member of our party discovered a grander scene than any previous one, and truly the grandeur did increase until, looking suddenly to my left, we saw our first glacier, when our enthusiasm knew no bounds. Here we left the train and all wanted to go immediately to the glacier, but we were persuaded that dinner was best for the hour, and I contented myself by taking a picture of it with my faithful kodak which had been clicking off snapshots all the forenoon. Dinner over, we left at once for the glacier and found it more than double the distance we had anticipated. We took pictures of it, went far under it, were chilled by it, and used all the adjectives and superlatives ten Americans could command. Grindelwald is a romantic village inhabited chiefly by those who tend the thousands of cattle in the adjacent mountain pastures, and nearly every one of these cattle, small and large, wears a beautifully toned bell, some highpitched and some low. The music of these Swiss bell ringers is indescribable. were always delighted when we came in sight of the cattle. The town is guarded by giant mountains—Eiger (13,040 feet), Mettenberg (10,197 feet), forming the base of the Shreckhorn, and the Wetterhorn (12,150 feet). The two glaciers, one on either side of the Mettenberg, are the lowest projecting portions of the vast ice fields of the Bernese Alps.

From here we took the cog-wheel railroad again and went up, up, up! until veg-tation became coarse and scanty, and finally the last pine tree was passed, then we were in the clouds, there above them and beholding the peaks still pointing above all this, with clouds for their base. I could only say—great, grand, gorgeous, immense! Flowers are beautiful, many things are lovely; but a great mountain peak, seen from above the clouds, piercing the sky—that is grand! "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

We left the train at Scheidegg and walked about two miles to where "upspringing from a world of glaciers rises the colossal Jungfrau (13,671 feet) in robes of dazzling whiteness." When Dr. Slusher beheld this be sail: "Gentlemen, that scene discourages language!" We spent this night above the clouds, and at sunrite, the next morning, when the Monch, the Jungfrau, the Eiger and the Shreckhorn were "tinted with a thousand hues," than which there is none other such scene on earth-I gazed with an admiration akin to nothing I had ever felt before; my heart melted within me and my eyes filled with tears-I had seen the glory of the Lord.

We heard two tremendous avalanches—great masses of ice breaking from the glacier, plunging down the mountain, breaking into a thousand fragments. The sound is marvelous, as echo after echo takes up the thunders with manifold reverberation.

We reluctantly left Scheidegg at 7:30 a. m., going down through the clouds, passing hundreds of cattle and goats until we came to Lauterbrunnen (meaning "nothing but streams"). The sun cannot visit this little town until 7 o'clock in summer nor till noon in winter. There are about twenty streamlets that come down from the mountains here of which the renowned Staubbach is the finest. It leaps down 900 feet—hence is the highest European waterfall—and the water is dissipated into spray before it reaches the bottom. The name Staubbach means "dust stream." It has been compared to an undulating lace veil; to a bird of paradise; and Byron compares it to the tail of

"The giant steed to be bestrode by Death, As told in the Apocalypse."

Wordsworth calls it a "sky-born waterfall." At this place all but one of our party, who was "scared out," took a car drawn by a cable—that went just one mile straight up the mountain side at an angle of 53°. Here we took an electric road to Murren, where we were to have one of the best views in Switzerland—of glaciers, rocks and ravines untrodden save by the daring chamois hunter.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

What do I think of "Chalk Lines Over Morals?"

What do I think? A difficult question to

The words in quotation marks are the name of a book containing a dozen lectures by the Rev. Charles Caverna, a minister in the Congregational Church. They ware delivered in Hershey Hall, in Chicago, in the winter and spring of 1882. It was, the author says, the opinion of certain gentlemen whom he characterizes as "progressive conservatives" that there ought to be a series of lectures each year in Chicago, giving rational treatment, popular as far as possible, of any subjects that might be in the field of thought, either in religion, philosophy, or sociology. Mr. Caverna was requested to give the first series. This he did. His series proved also to be the last.

The subjects of the lectures are: "Morals and God," "Morals and the Bible," "Morals and the Holy Spirit," "Moral Discernment," "Morals and Immortality," "Morals and Miracles," "Morals and Spiritism," "Morals, Politics and Law," "Morals and Divorce," "Morals and Capital," and "Morals and Labor." The lectures on "Morals and the Holy Spirit," "Morals and Immortality" and "Morals and Miracles" appear as if dragged in. The author seems to have made up his mind to give twelve lectures with the word "Morals" as a part of the title of each.

Now and again Mr. Caverna speaks with a rugged common sense on popular fads. I will not attempt to quote him, but give you the substance of what he says on a few topics.

It spiritism, popularly called spiritualism, is true we want little or nothing of it. In the first place, according to the confessions of those who believe in modern spiritualism, the communications which come from the realm beyond are unreliable. There are so many lying spirits that one does not know when to accept a message as true.

In the second place it is a meddling with matters before we get to them. It forgets he here in the there and so is hurtful to morals. It jumps arithmetic to fumble with conic sections. It neglects the strawberry and potato patch for cosmogony. It is said that alligators can count. But I would not have alligators 'Sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.' Let boys cipher and alligators bask in the bayous. We do best by holding to natural conditions. Let men work and think on their plane and spirits on theirs.

If a spirit should say, "I am here," the answer to it should be, "So am I." If a spirit says, "I can write," the answer should be, "So can I." If a spirit says, "I can be materialized," the answer should be, "I am materialized and can do more work in an hour than you can in a day."

If a spirit can wrench a slate from your hands, invite him to shovel gravel on the road. If a spirit can move a table or overturn a chair offer to pay for all the loaves of bread he will deliver to the poor in town. If he can do the one there is no physical, certainly no moral reason why he should not do the other. There are spirits who when they were in the body found pleasure in feeding the hungry, in clothing the destitute, in giving fuel to the cold. It would seem that now and again, if spiritualism is true, su h spirits would return to the earth and readily engage in works of benevolence. If not, why not?

Did you notice that in the discussion of trusts during the last campaign not a word was said by any orator about the greatest of all known trusts—the labor trust?

I cannot get the chance for my boy to learn the business of nail maker unless the nail makers' society will let him work at the trade, nor can my boy have anything to say about the rate of his wages. Ponder this fact.

When we settled this country we threw away castes of the highest orders, but workingmen in their labor organizations are doing their utmost to build them up from beneath.

Coal heaving is an honorable business, but it is not one to which to which a man ought to look forward as a life occupation, or seek to make hereditary in his family.

Yet it is only necessary for coal heavers to combine to regulate wages, in the way they ordinarily do, in order to secure poverty for everybody who works at the business and make both business and poverty hereditary.

If some athletic young man wants to work at coal heaving for a season or two in order to lay up money enough to buy a span of horses, a wagon and a plow for the homestead he is going to take up, and to buy some comforts for the young woman he is to marry, and he can handle twice as much coal in a day as men usually handle, he ought to have the benefit of his inspiration and his athletism and receive twice as much wages as other men. But this the coal heavers' union will not permit.

The tendency of workingmen's organizations, as manifested now by noisy and conscienceless demagogues, is to make each kind of labor a caste and make a slave of the free-born workingman.

During the last quarter of a century our legislation, both state and national, has been in the interest of the so-called workingman. As a result, in spite of the demagogues and his own unwisdom, his position is vastly better than it was twenty-five or thirty years ago.

There is more in the initial words of the Lord's Prayer to settle the conflict between labor and capital than in the solemn pronouncements of the dozen political platforms of the recent campaign. Our Father—then we are brothers, we belong to one family, our interests are identical, our burdens are the same, our goal is one. Your defeat is my shame; your victory is my glory. "No man liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself." The gospel of the Son of God is a social gospel. It has to do with the relations which men sustain to each other. It is time for sane men, and unselfish, to speak on current social problems.

THE SITUATION IN CHINA.

FRANK GARRETT.

Our China missionaries are all in Shanghai except Dr. Butchart who is in Japan We, in common with all other missionaries, are anxious to get back to our stations. The letters which come almost daily from our Chinese friends and brothers assure us that they anxiously await our return. They feel the need of our council and teaching. We hope for more successful mission work in the future.

But there is one danger which I wish to raise my voice against, the danger of having, in the terms of settlement for the present disturbances, a clause restricting the freedom of the missionary. It is said the missionary is chiefly to blame for the recent outbreak. This is simply an assertion and cannot be proven. On the other hand there is abundant proof to the contrary.

True, inasmuch as the gospel antagonizes the ancient faiths, it is not welcomed by those zealous for the old religions, but religious zealots are very few in China. common people only worship through fear, not for love of the idol or the religious system. Hence it is that the missionaries have gone into the provinces in large numbers and worked for decades and never encountered a So it was in Shansi, where the work had been peacefully prosecuted since 1877; and it had not been done secretly. In the capital Tainyuen-fu, for three years monthly lectures illustrated by limelight lanterns, were delivered to the interested mandarins on western religion and learning. Friendliness resulted. Not until the anti-foreign outbreak, which originated in the coast provinces, spread inland to Shansi was there any serious opposition.

The missionaries treat the natives with kindness and consideration. Commercial and political interests are advanced by the selfish, aggressive foreigner with cunning and cannon, not always, but frequently, to the injury of the Chinese. The boatmen, weavers and wheelbarrowmen, thrown out of employment by the steamboat, cotton mills and railways, add not a little to the force of the present movement.

The curse of opium fastened upon them by a foreign power is a strong cause of hatred. The taking of a small tract of land enrages a whole province. The rulers in Pekin see the foreigner too aggressive and, apprehensive of the future, seek to drive him out of the country.

But religious toleration has been a principle of the Chinese government for ages past. So laying the blame for the present outbreak upon the missionary is making a scapegoat of China's best friend. How Christian nations can consistently countermand the order, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel," I don't know. We will pray and work that they may not. Shanghai, Oct. 10, 1900.

CHICAGO LETTER.

This city had an unusually quiet election. The vote was heavy and there seemed to be a feeling of deep earnestness among the voters, but there were no brawls worth mentioning. This is highly creditable when we stop to think of the exceedingly heterogeneous character of our population; more than 90 per cent. are either foreign-born or children of foreign-born parents.

Now that national issues are out of the way, why not move for a revival of municipal patriotism? The vexing problems of municipal government have scarcely been noticed by the rank and file of respectable citizens. If anywhere on earth, surely in the large cities the words of the apostle are true, "None of us liveth to himself,"-especially if we live in flats. The recent conflict between the purveyors and promoters of vice in New York City and the Episcopal Church is in evidence to show what a serious obstacle in the way of the kingdom is municipal unrighteousness. The conditions about us either help or hinder the work of evangelization.

The great lack seems to be a lack of civic pride. If men were proud of their city, her buildings, her parks, her clean streets, her sanitary tenements, they would give closer attention to her affairs. Or perhaps the converse is equally true: if they gave closer attention to her affairs they would be proud of the city. Some time ago Michael Simons, a member of the Glasgow city council, visited Chicago, and in an interview he spoke enthusiastically on the subject of municipal ownership of public utilities. "It has increased our water and gas facilities, cheapened the price and helped to inspire in the community civic pride and virtue."

The fact seems to be that British and European cities are far better governed than American cities; we almost said, they are far more democratic, paradoxical as it may seem. In this country, the boss is supreme, and hence the government of our cities is the government of low-lived demagogues and political dictators. The party machine stands between the upright citizen and the nomination of candidates for municipal office. The leading parties are compactly organized in every ward and precinct; organized of men who have some selfish end in view, offices and salaries to gain, or favors or franchises, and they make a business pure and simple of city politics; it is dollars and cents, bread and butter to them. No wonder the average citizen declares that it is no use for him to attend the primary, where, if there be a contest, it is only one slate against another!

Not to dwell longer upon the evils, what is the remedy? The abolition of primaries and the annihilation of partisan control. In English cities the municipal tickets do not bear the party names. Not only so, but when it comes to candidates, half a dozen voters by petition may nominate a candidate. The very freedom and flexibility of the sytem tends to a minimum of nominations and contests. As no party names appear, the good of the city is both the immediate and the paramount issue.

Even in national elections, the pecuniary interests of the political leaders are far too much in evidence. Our whole system may be and ought to be amended by the introduction of direct legislation, and the extension of the civil service. "New occasions teach new duties;" happy are they who keep pace with the occasion in the patriotic performance of their duty.

The custom of having men's clubs is growing in our churches. This is certainly a wholesome symptom. The women and children are organized to the limit, and in most churches, aside from the official board, there is no men's organization. Why not bring the men together once a month, for the discussion of problems of government from the economic rather than the political standpoint? A program for the year could be mapped out, a reading course outlined and lectures had by specialists that would be wonderfully effective in quickening civic pride. All the usual social features could easily accompany this plan.

FRANK G. TYRRELL.

THE TEXAS LECTURESHIP.

M. M. DAVIS.

The Texas Lectureship was held this year at Taylor, November 69, and by all it was regarded a success. The attendance, not because of a lack of interest, but because of other unavoidable obstacles, was not so large as usual, and yet it was good. There were forty-five preachers and many other church workers present, besides a large number of Taylor people. The spirit of all the meetings was the sweet spirit of Christ, so that our fellowship was delightful and our worship was such as to lift us up nearer to the throne of our God. The singing, aided by the Add-Ran University quartet, was a marked feature, and it did much in making the Lectureship a success. The hospitality was of the old-fashioned Southern type, and each one was really honest in the belief that his home was the best. But so far as this scribe is concerned he knows that the hospitable mansion of Brother and Sister C. Mendel, where he stopped, was the best.

The addresses were of a high grade. Not one of all of them was ordinary. D. W. Pritchett on "The Plea of the Fathers" was vigorous and meaty, and it was heartily received; David Walk on the "Eldership" was all that the people expected of him. A. Buxton's paper on "The Cultivation of the Devotional Nature" was a happy treatment of a vital question. J. J. Cramer, one of our most successful pastors, out of his own rich experience told us of "The Successful Pastor." The scholarly and beloved J. W. Lowber was most suggestive and helpful in his short address on "Christian Sociology." "The Kingdom of God, its Nature and History,' by E. C. Boynton, would have done honor to a man of age, experience and national reputation. Addison Clark, the "old reliable," fully sustained his high reputation for close thinking and clear writing in his paper on "Conscience and the Bible." O. A. Carr's brief address on the Church was characteristic of the author. It was solid and sensible. Miss Mary Graybeil, fresh from the foreign field, thrilled all our hearts with the graphic story of her hand-to-hand conflict with heathenism. Would that all our people could hear this cultured and consecrated Christian woman.

But good as was all this, it was not the best. F. D. Power, of Washington City, our "Chief Lecturer," gave us four speeches which will not soon be forgotten. His first was "The Standard of Appeal in Religious Thought; or a Conservative View of the Higher Criticism," in which he argued that it was Christ and his teachings. His appeal was a strong one, and it will bear fruit. "Our Place in the Religious World" was his second address. He thinks we have a place, and a most important one, and that if we do not fill it God will raise up a people more worthy, and give to them the glory which he now offers to us. His third address was "A Quarter of a Century Pastorate." It touched every chord in the human heart. It was tender, humorous, eloquent, logical, practical, helpful. It was an inner view of the life and growth of a great metropolitan church, led on by a pious young man who himself was led of God. His last address was the famous lecture on Garfield. The martyred President, the brilliant statesman, the brave soldier, the dutiful son, the devoted husband and father, the orphan boy struggling with poverty and surmounting every difficulty, and the humble Christian, were all seen in him.

Bro. Power had no easy task assigned him. He was to follow such men as B. B. Tyler, Garrison, McGarvey, Briney and Pritchard, all of whom have been with us in our Lectureships, but he proved himself worthy of the distinguished succession, and, like them, won our hearts and paved the way for a still warmer welcome should he ever return to the Lone Star State.

The old officers were continued: J. Z. Miller, president; G. L. Bush, vice-president; A. E. Erwell, secretary and treasurer; and the executive committee also have a second term: G. Lyle Smith, V. R. Stapp and A. Clark

The next Lectureship will be in Waco, Tuesday-Friday after the first Sunday in December, 1901.

ONE OF BRO. PROCTER'S GEMS.

CLAYTON KEITH.

It was a lovely day in October, 1883, when a belated train put Bro. Procter into Louisiana, Mo. He was compelled to remain at either the depot or a hotel for several hours. I met him and took him driving over one of our smoothest roads and to the pinnacle above the city, where he had a view of the hills, the winding river and surrounding country for many miles. Nature was in her loveliest mood, having a charming dress of variegated colors. The air was pure and refreshing. And when he expressed himself as satisfied with the scene we returned. On our way home I remarked, "What a pity that Nature, so full of beauty and kindness to us to-day, should, before next winter is past, be cruel and austere. I want a sentiment from you on the cruelty of Nature." He began:

"Nature's laws know nothing of mercy to man. As Emerson says, 'Nature has teeth in her mouth' and she'll bite. When the temperature is below zero, the cold will freeze your toe or my toe as quickly as it will freeze a potato. Look at the Arctic explorers. 'We are in the hands of God and unless Nature relents we are lost.' These pathetic words were written in the note-book of the heroic commander of the Jeannette expedition, a few days before his death, in the wintry solitudes of Arctic Siberia. writer was a religious man. The entries in his journal show this. He speaks again and again of reading prayers. But the forces of Nature were relentless. The fast-falling band of explorers sought help in prayers as instinctively as children turn to their fathers for aid in distress. There is no kind answer. The white earth, the cold sky, the icy wind seemed to ask, in the mocking words of the English poet: 'Shall gravitation cease when you go by?""

"The great cosmic forces," says John Stuart Mill in one of his most impressive essays, "go straight to the end without regarding what or whom they crush on the road." Nature impales men, breaks them as if on the wheel, casts them to be devoured by wild beasts, burns them to death, crushes them with stones, like Stephen, the first Christian martyr, starves them with hunger, freezes them with cold, drowns them in the flood, poisons them with the quick or slow venom of her exhalations and has hundreds of other deaths in reserve such as the ingenious cruelty of a Nabis or a Domitian never surpassed. This view is terrible, but it is true.

Christians should recognize the fact, and not uniformly teach the existence of a benignity in Nature which is not confirmed by experience. God is kind. He is also terrible and "to be feared above all gods."

Louisiana, Mo.

The Chicago Drainage Canal has been formally tendered to the United States government. This means that the condition laid down in the law of the sanitary district that the canal shall carry 300,000 cubic feet of water per minute is now fulfilled and the channel is now a water-way deeper than the draught of any lake vessel and broad enough to float three of them abreast. The condition upon which it is to be handed over to the Federal government is that the Des Plaines and Illinois Rivers shall be so improved as to make a continuous deep water way from the lake to the Mississippi. Of interest in connection with this event is the legal battle which is now pending in the Supreme Court in regard to the canal. arguments were commenced on Monday of this week by representatives of the State of Missouri versus the Chicago Sanitary District. The argument against the canal turned upon the menace which it carried to St. Louis and the other cities along the Mississippi into whose drinking water is poured the sewage of Chicago. The defense dealt chiefly with technical points relating to the right of a state to take up the matter and the right of the court to issue an injunction against a work which had been completed at very great expense. But, as the attorney for Missouri said, "no amount of expenditure can justify a nuisance." matter to be determined is the question of fact: Does or does not the operation of the canal endanger the life and health of those who dwell below it?

Stockman's Fingers

SAME ON BOTH HANDS.

W. E. Beckham, a corking heavyweight of Barton, Kan., is in the live stock business. He did not need to pay much attention to the food he ate, until about two years ago an attack of the grip left him partially paralyzed. His experience with food is well worth reading.

"The third and little finger on each hand became partially paralyzed, and my spine was affected just below the back of the neck. This came from a severe attack of the grip two years ago. I almost entirely lost the use of my hands.

"This condition continued several months, in spite of alkinds of baths and treatments. In the meantime my stomach, bowels, and digestive organs became affected and deranged. My liver-seemed to have no more action than if I had no liver at all. No food of any kind tasted right, and I run down from 210 pounds to 160.

"One day the groceryman asked me if I had ever tried Grape-Nuts food. He told me that it was recommended as a brain and nerve food and that it was predigested.

"So I commenced the use of Grape-Nuts, and carried some in my pocket. Now and then when I felt hungry would take some of the food into my mouth and allow it to melt before swallowing. The food has a delicious taste and I began to improve right away. In three days' time I was very much better.

"I continued the use of Grape-Nuts, and continued to improve steadily. In a few weeks longer I was strong and had regained the use of my hands perfectly. In less than five months I was back to over 200 pounds, as you see me in the picture which I send. Am now 51 years old and never had better health in all my life. I passed a first-class medical examination about four months ago in a life insurance company.

"My recovery to good health is solely due to the use of Grape-Nuts food. As a brain and nerve food, there is nothing equal to it. You can use any part of this letter, and I hope it may lead some unfortunate invalid to health."

Our Budget.

- -J. J. Haley, of Cynthiana, Ky., informs us that the stonework of their new church is finished and the roof is on. It will be our finest church in Kentucky, with one exception.
- -The August-October number of the Missionary Voice, published quarterly by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, has been received. It contains all the facts that you want to know about the present work of the Foreign Society.
- -The American Christian Missionary Society has received eighteen hundred dollars on bequest, the interest only to be used in pushing the work of Home Missions. It is a Memorial Fund to Mrs. Marian Parmley, of Painesville, Ohio.
- -Read elsewhere in this issue the article by A. L. Orcutt on Ministerial Relief, and remember the day upon which he calls for an offering. We have no worthier cause than this of helping the veterans, and our long neglect of it should but add to our present zeal.
- -During the week ending November 15, the Foreign Society received $12,465.96, a gain over the corresponding week in 1899 of $12,044.98. We hope the Twentieth Century Fund will not fall a dollar below $200,000 for Foreign Missions. Send offerings to F. M. Rains, corresponding secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, O.

The Irvington (Ind.) Athenseum, an organization which owes its existence largely to the efforts of Prof. W. D. Howe, of Butler College, has secured a distinguished list of speakers for this fall and winter. Dr. Henry Van Dyke spoke before the Athenæum on Monday of this week on "Tennyson, with particular reference to the message of his poetry to the 19th century."

- -The new church at Bonner Springs, Kan., was dedicated October 28, by Vernon J. Rose. The congregation, under the ministry of W. E. Bobbitt, who became pastor a year ago, quickly outgrew its old building, which was sold for $700 and a new one built for $3,500. Bro. Bobbitt has a record as a church builder. During the past year about fifty have been added to the membership at Bonner Springs.
- -After waiting as long as we felt justified in doing for the missing numbers in Bro. Scoville's letters of travel to reach us, we begin in this number to publish those which we have on hand. We regret the necessity of disturbing their original order, but trust that the interest will not be materially decreased thereby. The second letter, which we have not yet received, evidently dealt with Paris. The third, which appears in this week's paper, has to do with Switzerland.
- -L. L. Carpenter, than whom no one has a more enviable reputation as dedicator of churches, dedicated the new house of worship at Stanford, Ill, November 11. It is, he says, the handsomest house he has ever seen in a town of its size. Of the total 'cost, which was $11,000, $5,500 remained to be provided for on dedication day, and this indebtedness was more than wiped out by a subscription of $7,000. Bro. Porter, the pastor, and his earnest congregation deserve much credit for the work they have done.
- -Writers take notice! One thousand dollars is offered by the American Sunday-school Union in prizes for the best book on the topic, "How is Man to be saved; or, God's Way of Salvation." There is a first prize of $600 and a second one of $400. The books should be of a practical and popular sort, in length from 40,000 to 70,000 words, typewritten, signed with a private mark and sent to the American Sunday-school Union, 1122 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, before November 1, 1901.

-The Old Folks' Home will be located in Jacksonville, Ill. An efficient board of officers has been elected from the membership of the church and work enthusiastically begun. Already two life memberships have been taken, one by Mrs. T. N. Hall, of Pittsfield, Ill.; another, Dr. Virginia Dinsmore, Jacksonville, Ill., and more to follow. Mrs Lutie B. Hatch has asked to furnish the first room complete, in memory of her husband, Dr. H. Lee Hatch.

-I notice in the Christian Evangelist of 8th inst., "An Old Subscriber" asks "Give reference to the commandment, 'Thou shalt not steal,' in the New Testament." I refer him to Rom., 13th chapter, 9th verse. While, as you say, "the whole Book inculcates those principles which are in antagonism to every species of dishonesty," yet the direct command, "Thou shalt not steal," is there. A. C. MCKEEVER.

Fresno, Cal., Nov. 15, 1900.

-The American National Red Cross Society has arranged for a special series of watch meetings to be held on the night of December 31 to greet the new century. Mammoth meetings have been arranged in the principal civies and they will be held at many towns all over the country. Greetings have been prepared by more than fifty of the most prominent men of every land, and a sealed package of these greetings will be sent to any meeting for which they are requested. For information, address the American National Red Cross, St. James Building, New York City.

-What can the poor Editor do in the face of communications like the following which is an exact representation of a note received a few days ago:

'Please stop the paper. I will send you your money. I Don't Want it any more and I don't think it worth while to well the reasons for not wanting it.'

There are quite a number of people who do not like our way of running a paper and occasionally -not often, but once in a while-one of them finds it so obnoxious as to discontinue his subscription. But those who do so almost always give us the benefit of some more definite expression of their opinions. Really it helps us a good deal to have a definite and intelligent expression of any reader's approval or disapproval. But indefinite praise, while it, of course, makes us feel good, helps us in the improvement of the paper scarcely more than this sort of unspecified disapproval.

-The Topeka State Journal, of Topeka, Kan., announces that a movement is on foot for the establishment of a new church in that city-a church whose "sermons would be on some line of theol gy, broad and expansive, a liberal theology, but the minister would only talk religion in his pulpit." The movement has been suggested, it is said, by the disgust which its leaders and many other people feel toward the habit of many ministers of talking politics in the pulpit. While it is certainly true that it is the minister's business to preach religion in the concrete and to insist upon righteousness in both political and commercial life, it is also true that there is a wider gulf between the real sermon and the political stump speech than some preachers realize. Poor Topela must, indeed, be in a bad way if those who object to politics cannot find even one church in town which meets their views on this point, but must start one of their own. It would seem, too, from the public statements of the leaders of this movement, that hatred for the Ministerial Union of Topeka may also be one of the cardinal doctrines of the new church. The Ministerial Union may have made some serious mistakes-we do not know about that-but the denunciation of it coupled with a declaration against politics in

The nineteenth annual report of the principal of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, Mr. Booker T. Washington, is a document of Junusual interest. It shows not only the present size and resources of the school-1,083 students. of whom one-third are young women, 103 officers and instructors and an income of $236,163.40 for the yea -but exhibits the kind of work which the institution is doing. The new Trade's Building, which was built during the past year, was designed by one of the instructors, was built by students and the plastering, carpentry, painting and roofing were done by students learning those trades. This is but one illustration of the practical direction which the work takes. Statistics show that at least three-fourths of the graduates and former students of the institution are earning their livelihood by use of industrial knowledge which they gained there and the others are doubtless benefited by the habits of thrift which are there inculcated as a matter of even more importance than technical training. There is a great demand for graduates of the school to serve as instructors in other industrial institutions. Note should be made of Mr. Washington's recommendation that the masses of the colored people should remain in rural districts, and industrial education should to this end lay stress upon agriculture. "The c lored man is at his best in rural districts where he is kept away from the demoralizing influences of city life." The work, as its principal says, is not sectarian, but it is thoroughly Christian and he notes with gratification the growth of the religious tone of

-A called meeting of the ministers of the city. which was held in the I. O. O. F Building on last Monday, considered the organization of what is to be known as the Christian Employment Association, whose object is to find employment for the Christian and worthy unemployed in our midst. This has been a long-felt want. The applications to the city pastor for help in this line, if well attended to, demand almost as much time as any other part of his work. It becomes burdensome and yet its importance is recognized by every pastor. This interdenominational plan will, it is hoped, to a very large extent relieve this burden, and prove of still greater advantage to the unemployed.

A committee, consisting of J. C. Banks, of the Union M. E. Church, Rev. Foster, of the Congregational; Rev. Carlton, of the Baptist; S L Lindsay, of the R public, and Rev. F. O Fannon, of the First Christian Church, was appointed to recommend plans and outline the best course to pursue. A plan to as ociate this work, by forming a new department, with the Y. M. C. A. was agreed upon as the most economical, practicable and efficient, and the association agreed to take up this work and push it as any other department of the Y. M. C. A., providing the churches of the city would vouch for the support of the newly apointed secretary, whose entire time was to be iven to this work. But the ministers disapproved f this plan. A joint committee will be formed, omposed of one minister and one layman from ach denomination and the work will be organized n an independent basis.

This movement, if wisely directed, will be apable of great good and will help to bring capal and labor together under Christian effort. It ill show both employee and employer that the burch is interested in them.

The Christian Lesson Commentary—1901.

For many years The Christian Lesson Com-MENTARY has been regarded by the great majority of our leading Sunday-school workers as easily the best of all the Sunday-school annuals. Thousands of superintendents, teachers and students look for its appearance each year. With the BIBLE and THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COM-MENTARY the teacher is well equipped for his work.

The volume for 1901 appeared about three weeks ago. About twenty-five hundred copies have already been ordered, and we are beginning to receive enthusiastic letters from those who have received and examined the book. We give two sample testimonials. The first is from the president of the Missouri Christian Bible School Co-operation:

New London, Mo., Nov. 13, 1900.

I have just received and examined The Christian Lesson Commentary for 1901. I am able to say of this volume even more than I have said of its predecessors, and that may have seemed extravagant to some. W. W. Dowling's work grows in efficiency with his years. He is the pioneer in Bible-school literature among us, and the yearly increase in his constituency goes to show his labors are appreciated. The Commentary for 1901 is well-nigh perfect. So far as the lessons for the year are concerned, the book is a library within itself, and I most heartly recommend it to all who are anxious to have the best help. This, so far as I have seen, is the best. For the price the work of the publishers cannot be improved upon.

J. B. Corwine.

Such a commendation from the man at the head of our organized Sunday-school work in Missouri should convince any who may be undecided what book to secure that THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY is what they should have. These testimonials are unsolicited. The following letter is from Benj. L. Smith, Corresponding Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society:

Cincinnati, O., Nov. 12, 1900.

I have examined with great pleasure THE CHRISTIAN LESSON COMMENTARY for 1901, edited by W. W. Dowling and published by the Christian Publishing Company, St. Louis. I commend this Commentary to our Sunday-school workers. Its clearness, its arrangement, its simple, workable blackboard exercises, its chronological

HOW TO FIND OUT.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settlement indicates an unhealthy condition of the kidneys; if it stains the linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it, or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

WHAT TO DO.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney and bladder remedy, fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in possing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night The mild and the extraordinary effect of Swamp-Root is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases. If you need a medicine you should have the best. Sold by druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes.

You may have a sample bottle of Swamp-Root and a book that tells more about it, both sent absolutely free by mail. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. When writing mention that you read this generous offer in the St. Louis Christian-Evangelist.

tables, its illustrative stories, all combine to render it helpful, practical and desirable.

Again we urge our patrons who desire the COMMENTARY to send their orders as early as possible and avoid the tremendous rush of December—especially the few days before Christmas. The price of the COMMENTARY is one dollar, postpaid. Six or more copies sent to one address may be had at the rate of $9.00 per dozen—75 cents each—not prepaid. Address the Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

N. M. Ragland.

N. M. Ragland, whose picture sppears upon our front page, comes from an old Welsh family which emigrated to Virginia in early colouial days Bro. Ragland was born in Boonville, Mo, on St Patrick's Day, 1848, and while he was a boy his parents moved to Clinton, where he grew to manhood and was converted. He attended Kentucky University a part of three sessions, returned to Missouri on account of the death of his father, and later was graduated from Christian University, Canton, in 1874. His first pastorate was at his old home, Clinton, which he served for six years. During his second pastorate at Sedalia, he was married to Miss Fannie Sparr, of St. Louis, who died in 1896. For the last fifteen years Bro. Ragland has served the church at Fayetteville, Ark., one of the oldest and strongest congregations in the state. He is the first and only superintendent of Endeavor work among the Disciples in Arkansas. A year or two ago he was appointed to go to Calcutta, India, to serve with W. M. Forrest in the work of the C. W. B. M. Bible Chair at the University of Calcutta. The advice of friends, based chiefly upon the condition of his health, persuaded him, much against his own inclination and the desire of the C. W. B. M., to abandon this work.

Crescent City Letter.

Several new families have moved to New Orleans from other states and we are hapeful of greater success. The congregation is united and consecrated. Our church building is so small and plain that when compared with the denominational churches, large and commodious as they are, we suffer by contrast.

With the increasing business coming to the city, the commercial successes that await us, all of which serve to make New Orleans a strategic point for the Disciples, it does seem plausible, at least, that it would be a paying investment for the Disciples in the nation to rally to the support of New Orleans in putting us into a church house that would reflect credit on a people over a million strong in the United States. A twenty or twentyfive thousand dollar church would greatly augment our work in this growing metropolis. The present church, very small and plain in structure, is situated on one of the handsomest sites in the city, overlooking a magnificent park, and in easy walking distance of the business center of the city. A dollar a head from 20,000 brethren of the growing south-west and west, whose products are daily finding shipment from this port, and which has been greatly increased since the Galveston disaster, turning a tremendous tide of trade to this important port-would be a noble investm nt.

The menbers of the Prytania Street Presby terian Church attended the last service in their old church building yesterday, which will be torn down to give place to a large and handsome structure, which report says will be the most beautiful church in the city.

Yesterday afternoon the writer attended the missionary session of the Southern Baptist Association, which met at the First Baptist Church The necessity of Home Missions was emphasized. The report of the Home Missionary committee set forth: First, the importance of frontier work. Secondly, that the large cities should be captured. It was shown that in the city of New Orleans, in the French and Spanish quarter there is a population of 100,000 white people and not a Baptist Church. Third, negro evangelization. The report says the Home Board is co-operating with the northern brethren in educating and evangelizing 10,000,000 negroes. Fourth, that a great work was being done in the mountain districts. Fifth, the report further says: "The Lord has blessed the Baptist missionaries in Cuba." Their missionaries are preaching to crowded houses and many converted to the light. The Southern Baptist Association asked Southern Baptists to raise this Centennial year $150,000 for Home Missions, and the Louisiana Baptists were apportioned $3,000.

The report on State Missions was interesting; however, 17 parishes (counties) in Louisiana did not have a Baptist Church; besides, in 15 years the Baptists had entered but two parishes. The speaker asked, at present rate how long would it take to enter the 17?

A gentleman from Lutcher, La., reported his town to have 1,500 inhabitants and not a church of any religious people.

The Rev. Mr. Ware endeavored to impress in his address that "a Baptist dollar goes as far as $3.00 goes extended for missions by any other denomination."

I felt more encouraged in the work of the Disciples in Louisiana, which has been productive of only meagre returns; and I was more impressed with the immense field that Louisiana offers for evangelistic labors. I om confident that when the plea of the Disciples is brought to the thinking people in our cities and large towns, it will find a ready response in the hearts of the intelligent masses and victory will result.

The State Evangelist, Chas. E. Dunlap, is faithfully discharging his duties. He visited eight churches during October and raised for state work in cash and pledges nearly $100.

The Lake Charles Church has called a pastor and his work opens up auspiciously.

Marion County has nine church-s with buildings, all in the west half of the county except Knoxville, which is in the center. In the east half of the county we have no church except a group of fifteen or twenty members, organized about forty years ago and meeting in a schoolhouse. In the east half of the county there are twelve towns ranging in population from 150 to 2,500. There are mission fields yet in Iowa.

Notes and News.

New York Letter.

The Second Church, Brooklyn, was the scene of a beautiful wedding on Wednesday evening, October the 31st, when Bro. John L. Keevil, the pastor, led Miss Ella M. Elllott, one of his charming young lady members, to the altar. The building was nicely decorated for the occasion and filled to overflowing with the friends of the pastor and the bride-elect. I had the happy privilege of performing the ceremony. Bro. Keevil had done excellent service in building up the Greenpoint congregation, and now that he has a charming helpmeet we naturally expect even greater success in his field of labor. May the Lord prosper and bless their lives in his service.

Having just read "The Reign of Law," by James Lane Allen, I wish to say, while it is one of the most delightful books, from a literary point of view, that has fallen into my hands, it is, nevertheless, calculated to do much harm to the faith of many young people who will read it. In the first place Mr. Allen does the College of the Bible and Kentucky University an injustice by locating "David," his hero, in them and making them largely the cause of the downfall of this young man's religious life. The pastor of one of our churches in Lexington is presented in conversation with doubting David as a brusque, unsympathetic and unchristian man. Such a presentation of a Christian minister will prejudice many readers against all ministers of the gospel and against the Church of Christ as well. President McGarvey says no student has ever been dismissed from the College of the Bible on account of becoming an infidel. And even if such were the case, one who knows the institution can hardly conceive of a young man's being expelled for doubting as David did at the time of his trial. When his professors asked him if he believed in God, he said, "Lord, I believe; help thou mn + unbelief." But later in his life he tells Gabriella, the devout Christian whom he loves, that he believes in the God of the Hebrews just as he believes in the God of the Babylonians, of the Greeks and other heathen nations. He does not believe in the Old Testament Scriptures as inspired, nor does he believe in Christianity as of divine origin. But he simply states, he does not argue. Neither does he produce any evidence. In these respects it is a hurtful book. The fruitage of infidelity in David is bitter, as it always is. He loses his friends, he feels the loss of Christian fellowship, and finds that even his father and mother are embittered toward him. Against these losses his higher nature cries out for relief. This is not strange, for unbelief breeds pessimism and despair. Charles Darwin, the great scientist, denied food to his soul so long that at last he confesses that he was conscious that his higher spiritual nature had atrophied In his latter years he could find no delight in poetry or music, or any such thing. He regretted this, and said that if he had his life to live over again he would give some time every week to the cultivation of these elements in his nature. Since the world by its wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. Men will believe if we will faithfully and strongly preach Christ as the Savior of lost men.

The Rev. N. D. Hillis, of Brooklyn, in a sermon on last Sunday declared that if a great revival does not sweep over this country in the opening of the new century, it will be because of the negligence of the preachers. He thinks the people are ready for an enterprise of evangelism that will compass the whole country. He suggests that the ministers of New York plan a

"The Praise Hymnal comes nearer the ideal of what a hymn book should be than anything I have seen. It can not full to educate and improve the taste of any people using it.

"We have been using the 'Praise Hymnal,' in the Warren Church for two or three years, and we consider it the best we have ever had. We are trying to get a sufficient number to put one in the hand of every worshiper in our large congregation.

J. M. VAN HORN, Warren, O.P.

"For hymns suited for all occasions of worship, carefully selected, well printed and well arranged, I know of none that I can endorse more heartily than the Praise Hymnal. HENRY PEARCE, ATKINS, Harrodsburg, Ky."

great series of meetings to be held in New York in January and February, and that in March we spread into the towns and cities round about the metropolis. This all sounds good, and certainly if men could be brought to Christ in great numbers in this way it would be a most desirable thing to do. But I am inclined to think Dr. Hillis is mistaken in placing the whole responsibility of this work upon the preachers. The true minister of Christ is always ready to do just this sort of work. The old Jerusalem Church evangelized Judea and Samaria and then went out into the uttermost parts of the earth when the disciples "weat everywhere preaching the word." Similar results will follow a similar work to-day. One of the greatest needs of our time is a witnessing church, a church whose every member testifies, by word and deed, to the verity of the Christian faith and hope. Such a church would continuously enjoy the blessings of evangelism. This should be the normal condition of the Church of Christ: anything else is abnormal. The preachers, however, can do much toward producing this desirable state of affairs; then the churches, and not the preachers, will conduct revivals.

S. T. WILLIS.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

The first Lord's day in December is given for the placing of the enterprises of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions before the people.

It is hoped the observance of this day will be general. The Sisterhood has undertaken much work for Christ and his church and should have the opportunity of presenting it to his people. The sisters are seeking to increase their membership, to call others to the service they have found so precious, and want to make this a day for the enlargement of their forces.

The pastors and elders of our congregations should give the auxiliary members all possible help in arranging for the celebration of C. W.B. M. Day. Above all let fervent prayer be offered that the message given may be blessed.

It is no small thing that in many of our congregations little groups of the women are studying the best ways of advancing the reign of Christ upon the earth. On the first Lord's day in December they will try to tell the Church the results of their efforts. Let the people hear them with love, pray for the work and honor the great Head of the Church by helping forward the women who are laboring with Christ for the advancement of his kingdom.

They have chosen as their watchword for this year, "Missionary education for the world's evangelization," and aim to secure twenty thousand readers the Missionary Tidings, two thousand auxiliaries and an advance of $20,000 for the twentieth century. Surely this is a worthy aim, help them to reach it by giving your best giftf of prayer, thought and money on C. W. B. M. Day.

Ordination.

On Wednesday evening, Oct. 31, at Lynnville, Ill., Bro. J. W. Camp, of Riggston, Ill., was ordained to the ministry. Bro. Camp has been a member of the Lynnville Church from his boyhood. He spent a number of years at Eureka College and is at present pastor of the church at Concord, Ill. Tae Lynnville Church rejoices greatly in the honor of sending him forth as a herald of the King.

Bro. James H. Campbell, who with Bro. Camp served as elders of the church, was also ordained as elder. It was inspiring to all to have these good men set apart to this holy ministry by fasting, prayer and imposition of hands. The writer, their pastor for four years, officiated, together with Bro. A. C. Roach, another former pastor and now associate pastor at Jacksonville, and Bro. Newton Bundy, pastor at Chapin, Ill.

FRANK L. BOWEN.

Ocean View, Del.

The Mt. Zion congregation near Ocean View is the only congregation of Disciples in the state of Delaware. Once we had a mission in he city of Newark, for which Brother McLeod preached; but the mission has been abandoned. Nearly three years ago I came to minister unto the Mt. Zion congregation. Since coming here there have been twenty or twenty-five additions and the church has purchased a lot and built a house of worship in the town of Ocean View. The church contributes to State and Foreign Missions besides partly supporting me.

The Coast Assembly of the Church of Christ is located about two miles from here. A company of capitalists from Scranton, Pa., has been incorporated under the laws of Delaware, and has purchased one thousand acres of land. They will, lay off about thirteen acres of land in walks and flower beds, and the company will erect an auditorium to seat between three and four thousand people, which they will deed, free of cost, to the Disciples of Christ. There will be a park of about ten acres. The company is now laying off the city with streets, avenues and boulevards. Already a number of lots have been sold. Those wanting lots had better apply soon. Write to R. R. Bulgin, Millville, Del.

The climate here is mild and the ozone from the salt water will invigorate the body and send a healthy life fluid coursing through the veins. I hope that quite a number of the brethren everywhere will purchase lots.

By the time this is in print the company will have a charter for an electric or steam railroad from Dagsboro to Ocean View Beach.

Brother Shinnal our blind preacher from Virginia, has been called to preach for the Mt. Olivet and Perry Hawkins congregations on the eastern shore of Maryland. JACOB WALTERS.

Christian Education in Illinois.

The Eureka College Aid Association, organized for the purpose of awakening greater interest in the cause of Christian education in Illinois, was at the recent convention at Bloomington, Ill., reorganized as a permanent association.

Having lived through the experimental stage of its existence and demonstrated beyond doubt its right to existence, and the wisdom of its plea, the association is ready to do mor, aggressive work toward securing to the Disciples of Illinois the blessing of an institution of learning where Christian training is an ever-present element of college life and work.

The history of the association is such as to win the cordial approval of the churches and college authorities. Although the presentation of the work in other localities has been prosecuted by a field secretary only a few months of this time, yet over 500 women have united in the work and $2,567.83 have been raised for the college.

It has long been recognized that the women possess the greater part of the zeal for education. To the women of the University Bible Chair movement is due the organization and sustainment of the most progressive plan for promoting Christian education hand in hand with the best secular edu cation offered by the universities. To these same women and others we may confi ently look for cooperation in promoting Christian education within the limits of the state of Illinois.

The cause of Christian education in Illinois, though lying at the very foundation of all growth and development of the Christian Church, receives but meager encouragement. The Disciples in Illinois have but one institution of learning. Yet few churches recognize its support either as a duty or as a blessed privilege for investing money where its benefits may be reaped over and over again in the consecrated lives and work of its educated youth.

The members of the Eureka College Aid Association pay $1.00 or more per year, and are considered agents of good will and centers of college interest in their several communities.

At the recent convention plans for future work were discussed and a recommendation was carried to undertake as special work, as soon as the association is strong enough, and with the approval of the trustees and faculty, the endowment of a chair in Eureka College. This chair, appropriately named for the devoted and efficient president of the association, Mrs. S. J. Crawford, is to be occupied by a woman who will act not merely as an instructor in the college, but have oversight of the young laiv students as well.

With this as a definite future work, the members of the association, with Miss Mary Hedrick as field secretary and organizer, are pressing on with fresh enthusiasm, confident that the friends of Christian education throughout the state will gladly lend their influence and membership toward the furtherance of such a worthy enterprise.

Sensible Temperance.

A WORD TO TEMPERANCE LADIES.

It is universally admitted that temperance women work for their cause with a desire to make life happier; that is, intemperance in drink causes an immense amount of misery in human life, and the temperance movement is an effort to replace this misery with happiness, peace and comfort.

Many temperance women make the mistake of going at the subject hammer and tongs and proposing to force people to believe their way. It is far better to exercise a broad charity and take the position that one's own peace of mind and happiness, not only of the individual, but of the family and friends, depends upon sensible habits of life.

A very much greater foe to human happiness than whiskey exists, and it will startle many an honest temperance worker when the name of that foe is given. It is spelled c-o-f-f-e-e. "I don't believe it," some ardent temperance worker says, who is really a slave herself to the coffee cup.

Cast your thought among your sick friends, nervous, irritable, brokendown women whose homes are anything but peaceful homes because of the irritation and friction brought about by their physical and mental condition. In ninetyfive cases out of a hundred, the nervousness, irritability, dyspepsia, kidney trouble, female troubles and various diseases which such people are subject to, come directly from a brokendown nervous system, brought about by the daily use of coffee. Careful chemical analysis proves this statement to be absolutely true and personal experiment will prove the same to any one who cares to make it.

You may have a few friends who are made miserable by whiskey, but you have scores of friends whose lives are made miserable, as well as the lives of their families, by the use of coffee. Hard to believe, isn't it? Many of the most profound truths are not accepted by humanity when first brought to humanity's attention, but they are truths nevertheless.

Try for yourself, reader. Leave off coffee altogether and start in with Postum Food Coffee. which can be obtained at any first-class grocery store. You will find within ten days an improvement in the sum total of happiness for yourself and for your friends about you. Life will take on a new aspect; strength, vigor and vitality will begin to come back for your use. You can do things that you have heretofore been unequal to. You can accomplish something in this world, and you can quietly and without ostentation become a most efficient worker in securing to humanity that neace, content and happiness that we are all seek-

Babbitt's

Powder, or Pure Potash or Lye, or Best Baking Powder,

It is the Best

Lord's Day, Dec. 16, 1900.

One of the last things to be done in this wonderful century, and one of the best things to be done at many other times, is for individuals and churches to make liberal contributions to the good cause of Ministerial Relief. This is no charity affair, as some are pleased to look upon it, but one of the expressions of a real, genuine Christianity, in the payment of an honest debt. No essential element in the religion of Jesus Christ needs more emphasis to-day than that which manifests itself in "ministering to the necessity of saints." To do for the needy of earth that which they could not do for themselves, is the fulfilment of the mission of the Son of God to this world; and this not only in the spiritual, but in every sense of humanity's needs. Every spiritually-minded individual loves God; and because he loves God he loves the children of God. Deeds of kindness are love's simple language. Loving is doing. If we love God, then we love our brethren also, and this means to reach out a helping hand.

We have not done what we could and should have done in this matter. The report made to the Kansas City Convention by the Board of Ministerial Relief shows that only $6,173.79 were handled in cash last year; that the permanent fund is only $16,907.22 It is true that, as an organized effort, this work is only five years old, and I am told that it will take time to work it up. Perhaps it will, but it seems to me that it ought to take no more time than is required to strike the chord to which every Christian heart should be attuned. And the simple statement that there are a number of our worthy and beloved brethren who are both hungry and cold, and that the good Father who gives us all is calling upon us to help them, ought to strike that chord, and the music which arises to heaven be the mingled sounds of the jingle of our silver and gold with the expression of their heart's gratitude.

Brethren, there is a real joy, the joy of righteousness reflected back upon the soul, in knowing that you have helped to supply the needs of these good brethren, and that you have added just a little to their joy. Hear them: "I am al nost helpless and have no help only what you give me. . . . I feel that the good Lord is very good to me in giving such brethren to minister to my necessities." And "I do not know what I should have done had it not been for your timely check." And what more need I say? We already have enough of such replies to the little favors done to make a small volume.

I would that we might all rise above the idea of simple duty, and having such measure of the Christ spirit as would enable us to ay, for the joys that are set before us, we will help these dear brethren.

Look at the heading of this article again, keep in mind the appointed time, and prepare yourself in heart and purse to do in this matter waatso-ever the Lord would certainly have you do.

Send all contributions to Howard Cale, Pres., Indian apolis, Ind. And may the ble-sing of heaven be upon you.

A. L. ORCUTT, Cor. Sec. be upon you.

Announcement.

Following instructions from the Convention the Board has employ d A. C. Roach, Jacksonville, to serve as evangelist under the pay of the Bibleschools and he has the work of securing the contributions through the superintendents. Roach will remove to the territory north of Galesburg and organize missions in new fields and grow them into churches. Circulars are sent to superintendents giving the plan in detail and he wil announce his address as soon as it is decided. It is hoped that all our Bible schools will give him a cordial support. This is pure missionary work and is to be done where we have no surrounding churches. J. FRED JONES, Sec.

Missouri Mission Notes.

The appropriations for the ensuing year are be ing made and they are calling for a large increase in treasury receipts. We are now sustaining five men in South Missouri, besides helping at Doniphan, in Ripley County. Help is continued at Beulah and Tuxedo, in St. Louis, and newly granted to Carondelet and West End. Westport, in Kansas City, and South St. Joseph are new mission points, while help is continued at Warrenton, Jef. ferson City, East Moberly, Bucklin and Gorin.

Thus, you see, we have seventeen men now on the pay-roll besides the office force. This is a considerable increase over the force employed at this time last year, while the apportionments remain practically the same. This means that we must have every church in the state enlisted as far as possible, and more of the churches must pay their full apportionment. There are a number of life members who are in arrears with their payments and money is very much needed now to keep the work moving till the opening of the year. The great majority of our field force are poor men, they need their money as fast as it is due, and especially just at this season of the year when the winter's supplies must be provided. Some of the churches who promised to pay before October 1, have not done so yet. I entreat you, brethren, that you do so now. We are in the very largest need.

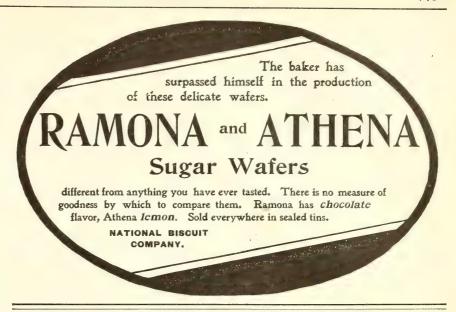

Again, some of the churches can pay this year's apportionment at once; will you not do it? It will come as a blessing of such great magnitude that we shall be indeed doubly grateful therefor. We shall try to get out the notices next week, but don't wait for that, send at once. Are there not some friends of the work throughout the state who will become a to help on this work by voluntary contributions? The convention instructed the board that: "Whereas, it is desirable to place our State Mission work on a permanent basis; and whereas, other states have found it a great benefit to raise permanent funds, Ohio having $48,476, Illinois $22,207 and Indiana $11,000; and whereas, such funds produce both cash and security in years of depression and need, th refore, we heartily recommend that our State Board and corresponding secretary be requested to raise a permanent fund of $25,000, or more, to be invested in first mortgage securi ties, the interest only of which may be used, and that every effort be made to secure personal gifts and legacies for this fund." These are our instructions. Who will lay the foundation of a for State Mission work? Have we not those in Missouri who love the cause as well as our b-ethren in the states named love the cause in their states? Surely so. It would be a sad comment upon our people if this were not so. Can you do a better thing for the cause you love than to build up a fund by the help of which men will go on preaching the gospel of the blessed Christ after you have gone home to be with him? What joy, as the cycles of eternity roll on, to know that I have left here in my own land an influence that will people heaven with the redeemed! Who will be the first to answer the call and begin this work in the Master's Yours in Hi- name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

More schools will keep Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America this year than in both previous years, and if you are not planning for it, the time is not entirely too late. See to it, writing B. L. Smith, Y. M. C A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, for supplies free gratis.

The work at Balm had come to a standstill no school, nor worship, nor preaching for nearly a year, but R. B. Havener has revived things generally, and now J. T. Bunch will preach for them, they are to finish their house immediately, and Miss Dean Chandler is superintendent, and there were 16 additions, just the work the people of God want done among the weaker and discouraged brethren.

The kindness of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and Register is such that we do not wish to monopolize the space, so that brethren must allow us to abide our time and place. No better friend in all Missouri to this work than are the above papers, doing the best for us they can.

At Raytown, we have had friends these many years; though I had never gone near them, they always met their apportionment, and on my going we had a good day, the brethren and C. B Lotspeich having made all preparation and when asked to join our army of 500 giving one d llar each, thirteen of them responded, besides the school apportionment. O. A. Ishmael followed up the rally with a meeting, while I went to other work happy in the Lord.

Did you hear? We want 500 names to put before the next convention, representing 500 friends that, outside of the school apportionments, have given us one dollar each, and it is a great pleasure to say that we are getting many of them. Will you be one? Why not? Is there better cause? Where?

John Gidd as is doing the work at Tavern that tells, and now they are putting on the paint, and we will soon have another good house in which to worship and work.

Missouri City and Garden City are two friends that meet with regularity their apportlonments to this work, which ought to be done by so many.

Have you a Teacher's Assistant? One who shall assist in seeing to order in school, in recitation; see to absentees, visiting the sick; representing the class on public occasions or times of gloom; one that quickens the class spirit and credit; one who is generall; useful to the teacher. Try it.

A superintendent writes that they have decided on Boys and Girls' Rally Day for America, "only we are a little late for the program prepared by the General Home Board, and want you to suggest one a little more brief." Well, am glad you are going to observe one anyhow. But put in the time, and "The Flag and the Cross" will serve you well, for it is fine and no mistake, and if it must be, why have the rally the Sunday following Thanksgiving. But be sure and have the rally, you owe it to the children, to the church, to Home Missions.

We are nearing the third quarter, and more than two-thirds of the schools have not remitted for either, hence our constant begging. Help us by sending the full year's pledge or apportionment H. F. DAVIS. right away, please.

New London.—I am here at New London in a good meeting. Having fine audiences and good prospects.—W. T. Moore.
St. Louis.—Beulah Church, at the corner of Marcus Avenue and Hammett Place, began a series of gospel meetings, Sunday, Nov. 18, W. A.

Moore, pastor, preaching.
St. Louis.—The Fifth Church, W. F. Haman, pastor, commenced a protracted meeting Wednesday, Nov. 15, S M Martin, evangelist, assisting in the conduct of the meeting.

Nevada, Nov. 12.—Two additions at Rinehart yesterday. Will commence a meeting with the church at Walker next Saturday night.—S. Magee.

St. Louis,-The Compton Heights Church closed a short meeting Nov. 9, with 17 additions. We were ably assisted by S. D. Dutcher, of Mexico, this state, who made many friends while among us.—Sherman B. Moore.

Fayette, Nov. 15.—We have just closed a very successful meeting at Ashland, eight miles south-east of Favette; 27 additions, 16 new converts, six re-laimed, five from other churches.—Arthur N. LINDSEY, pastor.

Monroe City, Nov. 12 -We started a meeting here with a Sunday-school Rally yesterday. Two hundred present at Bible school and fine crowds at both church services. W. N Briney, of Parls, will begin preaching for us to-night. We are expecting and praying for a genuine revival. The Monroe City Church remembered the stricken sufferers in Galveston a few Sundays ago; collection about $30 .- RUSSELL B. BRINEY, pastor.

St Louis, Nov. 19 .- At the First Church, F. O. Fannon, pastor, six additions yesterday; 12 since last report. At Ellendale, A. J. Marshall, pastor, four additions Nov. 18. At Beulah, W. A. Moore, pastor, three additions in meeting with home forces. One addition at Fifth Church, W. F. Haman, pastor.

Cameron, Nov. 18.—Bro C. M. Chilton, of St. Joseph, assisted Bro. White in a four weeks' meeting here, which closed last evening. The e were 25 additions; 19 by primary obedience. This makes our membership over 700 Among the 25 added are several splendid business men.—WILL H. BROWN.

Interesting, if True.

You Can Try It For Yourself and Prove It.

One grain of the active principle in Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest 3,000 grains of meat, eggs or other wholesome food, and this claim has been proven by actual experiment which anyone can perform for himself in the following manner: Cut hard boiled eggs into very small pieces, as it would be if masticated, place the egg and two or three of the tablets in a bottle or jar containing warm water heated to 98 degrees (the temperature of the body) and keep it at this temperature for three and one-half hours, at the end of which time the egg will be as completely digested as it would have been in the healthy stomach of a hungry boy.

The point of this experiment is that what Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will do to the egg in the bottle it will do to the egg or meat in the stomach and nothing else will rest and invigorate the stomach so safely and effectually. Even a little child can take Stuart's Tablets with safety and benefit if its diges-tion is weak and the thousands of cures accomplishtion is weak and the thousands of cures accomplished by their regular daily use are easily explained when it is understood that they are composed of vegetable essences, aseptic, pepsin, diastase and Golden Seal, which mingle with the food and digest it thoroughly, giving the over-worked stomach a chance to recuperate.

Dieting never cures dy-pepsia, neither do pills and cathartic medicines, which simply irritate and inflame the intestines.

When enough food is eaten and promptly digested there will be no constipation, nor in fact will there disease of any kind because good digestion means good health in every organ.

The merit and success of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are world-wide and they are sold at the moderate price of 50 cents for full sized package in every drug store in the United States and Canada, as well as in Europe.

For the information of those interested a little book will be mailed free by addressing F. A. Stuart C., Marshall, Mich., giving briefly the symptoms of the varied forms of stomach weakness, causes and cure.

STRUGGLING TOWARD THE

BY WALTER S. SMITH.

Chap. IV.—Prof. Guthrie; A Double Surprise.

At the time of the Norris trial, "Prof." Paul Guthrie was forty-four years of age. Like Job Norris, he had his membership in the Bend congregation on account of the distance of the Bend from the place where he would have preferred to place it. He always liked the Baptists; and, until this action, he had no objection to their polity. He had no great acquaintance with their special tenets; and, as they were devout and active, he worked contentedly along with them for his four years of residence there as teacher of the public school. He was a firm and manly fellow, and his qualifications entitled him to much respect. Born of the stern old Presbyterian stock of Scotland liberally mixed with the inflexible blood of Wales, he had certain traits that rendered him readily conspicuous. He could sing, play on several instruments, write poetry, make a speech, drive a good horse, build a coal fire, keep a garden, relate an anecdote, deliver a lecture or conduct a debating society. Of Northwest territory birth, he had been liberally educated; and, knowing well the workings of the public school system of Indiana, he had been called to the Bend to organize the graded school in the handsome new building. It was a success from the start; and all the people were with him, except the doctor above alluded to and a few disreputable characters who disliked the preacher and Job Norris and all who tried to keep themselves clean. Lige Taggart, John Elliott, Rip Peak, Walter Brown, and Joe Revell disliked him; and some of them annoyed him in all he tried to do. At least three of them owed him bills for schooling which they had never paid; and the doctor and Elliott got out of their bills, as they did out of many obligations, by positive lying. In Kentucky the public school fund is weak, and to employ strong teachers the patrons pay tuition rates in addition to the public money.

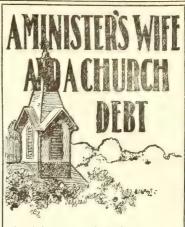

But every year the good teacher was reelected to the work by strong majorities, and the school went on in spite of Satan and this little army of his. Paul was much impressed with what he saw in the trial. He was already unfriendly to sectarian bigotry, and, as he abominated all acts of injustice, the treatment meted out to his noble friend, Norris, excited all the Welsh and Scotch of his nature. Calling on Norris, he freely talked it over. At first he advised him to demand a re-hearing. But, thinking better of it, he acquiesced in Job's decision to bear it without remonstrance. Job's view was adopted as correct; to-wit, that the sectarian spirit would not be corrected by a fight. But to see that good man and his model family still attending the Sunday-school and the church services, was to Paul a great surprise.

The two families became more and more fond of each other; and, as Paul read Job's papers and books, he became greatly interested in the Christian Church. He asked many questions about Campbell and Scott and Stone; and before he was aware of it he had passed all barriers, and was fully committed to the simple Jerusalem creed—the faith of the apostles and prophets. It struck him with genuine Scotch and Welsh conviction. Being a ready speaker he delivered pioneer philippics against sectarianism; and fully two-thirds of the Bend church endorsed him.

After Rev. Henry's resignation, the church was without the shepherd for a few months, and Prof. Paul was one of three to take each his turn in edifying the saints. All the people said he could preach; and in spite of his philippics, he was requested to fill out the unexpired year.

He consented on condition first, that the y should find another minister before the year was out, if they were able to do so; second, that he should not be restricted in what he should say. Entering thus on a new line of study, he prepared original sermons on the purity of the gospel, and the sin of sectarianism, that made all the people think and read; and as Revell and the wicked doctor did not attend, there was but little irritation. Their meanness, however, was displayed in a bitter effort to get the school out of his hands. Having himself become so deeply interested in the ministry, although re-chosen for the fifth year, he declined to serve as principal again; and, while on a visit in Lexington, he and his wife cast their membership with the Disciples. The church at the Bend was never again satisfied with the narrow views displayed in the Norris trial; and the dogma of close communion was never more mentioned except in condemnation.

Paul saw in a Christian paper a call for a man to take an evangelistic field in Indiana. The man who wrote the call was in the very village where Guthrie had taught his first important school. Answering the advertisement, he stated that he had been preaching but one year, and not at all as an evangelist; but as he would like to work in the ministry, and in an Indiana field, he would be willing to undertake it. The answer came back altogether favorable: "There are people here who know you, who attended your school, who have read your

A minister's wife in Buffalo writes:

"Our church was encumbered with a mortgage. The Ladies' Home Journal and The Saturday Evening Post seemed to offer a chance to accomplish something for the work, and I took the matter to the Ladies' Aid Society. I proposed that each member should enter her subscription, and try to secure other names. My plan was received enthusiastically. In addition to our own members we obtained subscriptions from many not connected with the church. Everywhere we went we talked Journal and church mortgage. Soon we had subscriptions enough to reduce the mortgage considerably, and with very little work."

articles in the papers, and who are very sure you will succeed as an evangelist. Come at your convenience, and visit four or five of our churches, and I think you can go to work at once."

This seemed to Mr. Guthrie a providential call, and he accepted the suggestion. Although the congregations were busy preparing for their Christmas festivities, they turned out to hear the preacher, liked him, instructed for him, and he was employed Returning to Kentucky, he ladjusted his affairs there and left for his new field. He met the Board on Saturday, January 19, 1889. This Board consisted of delegates from about twenty congregations who had gone into a compact to co-operate in the employment of an evangelist who should hold meetings in destitute places, who should aid the weak churches and "set in order the things that were wanting" in any part of the dis-The state had been divided into about thirty districts. The fourteenth district embraced three counties, and it was to this charge that Paul was called. | Silver

There was present at the Board meeting a delegate from the church at Luzon, who urgently pressed the Board to allow the evangelist to begin his work there. These were his earnest words: "Brethren, we are in great need of a meeting. We have no preaching and our church is empty and idle. There is a young Baptist preacher there who is out of work and who is willing to preach for us in a union meeting. We have told him he might preach till we could find a man; and he said that would suit him exactly. He will be glad to give way any day; and if you will send Bro. Guthrie there, I am sure a great deal of good can be done."

On motion of one of the delegates this request was granted; and all agreed that the work should begin there in two weeks. It could not begin earlier, because some visiting must be done in the co-operation to bring up the pledges for support.

Paul went about his work with a light heart, and in the two weeks, he was fully ready for Luzon.

Meantime Timothy had bravely undertaken the union meeting; although his spirit was weighted with the lies from Sunrise. The committee had made a faithful examination; but when they reached Sunrise they found the scandal all pointing to the Bend; and when they went to the Bend, they found it all centered in his act of "loyalty" in expelling a heretic who persisted in quoting "Campbellite Scriptures;" and as for bad morals, all they had heard had come from Sunrise, and "Lige Taggart and a gossipy widder over there had started it all." This information came directly from Squire Lee. of the committee. Nobody believed that Henry ever drank in the lumber yard, because he fought whisky all the time; and as to running away from his wife, that gossip was his mother-in-law's meanness, for everybody knew he had returned from two visits from the interior directly to his wife in a week, each time; and the committee knew she was now with him at Luzon.

As to his conduct toward his singers, these young women were among the best girls in Sunrise and Taggart had already received a handsome thrashing for his speech on that subject.

So they had returned fully prepared to exonerate the young preacher; but as they found him engaged in a union meeting, they decided to wait till it was over, and then make his vindication ceremonially public. With all this load pressing upon his fair name, he began very humbly indeed. There were pharisees in Luzon, as well as in Jeru salem; and they would not go to hear a preacher that was talked about. There were but few that did go at first; but as his singing was fine, and his sermons earnest and fiery, they gradually dropped in. In the two weeks, the audience had increased to almost two-thirds of a houseful.

Wednesday night of the second week a lady came forward, desiring to become a Christian. He could not ask the congregation to vote upon her fitness to be baptized, for she desired to unite with the Christian Church, and that, with them, would not be good form. He could not well ask her to recite a Christian experience, for that also would be of doubtful propriety. He asked. one of the elters what to do, and he replied: "take her confession." Henry was able to do this, but he did it very awkwardly; and he inwardly prayed that he might not have it to do again, until he knew more about it But oh, how glad he felt! It was the very day of the committee's return; and he soon met the leader, who assured him that the scandal from the river had been investigated, and had all dwindled away to nothing. He had only done right in expelling a heretic; and all the balance of the allegations were false. Clear! clear! clear! So said the committee and so rejoiced the accused. But two things confronted him to mar his rejoicing. First, he knew he had not done right in expelling such a heretic as Job Norris: second, he perceived that he lacked a great deal of being fit to hold this meeting. That very night he wrote to Rev. Paul Guthrie at Phocis, "Come! Come at once! There is an interest here, and you are sadly needed! One lady has already expressed her desire to be a Christian, and I am sure there are others."

Paul received this letter on Friday, and regarded it as providential; for he had just completed the rounds and was aiming to reach Luzon the next day. The letter surprised him no little; for he had lost the whereabouts of the young preacher. But his surprise was as nothing compared with that of Rev. Henry, when at two o'clock the next day the well-known teacher from the Bend drove into town. They shook hands several seconds and acted like two long-separated brothers.

Thy Will Be Done.

BY ALICE CURTICE MOYER.

And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away.-Rev. 21:4.

"Thanksgiving, and I cannot give thanks." Within was light and warmth and comfort, but the sad faced woman at the window heeded not these things. Her thoughts went out to the spot called Calvary-the city's "city of the dead." She could see a little grave which, since the last Thanksgiving, had covered the remains of her only child. She dwelt upon the Thanksgiving of one year ago, when home was such a joyous place because of the presence of that little one. And now-now the rosy lips that had so often and so lovingly lisped the name of mother, the blue eyes in which shone the light of a soul from God, undefiled, the little feet whose patter was sweetest music-all were forever shut away from mortal sight, all were in the cruel cold-she shuddered and could not finish the thought; but she stretched out her arms to the world without. O, for one glimpse of the dear little face, for one moment more to experience the joy of the little clinging arms, for just once more to hold the little form close to her heart! Tears like drops of heart's blood blind her sight and her heart aches with an agony of longing that can be understood only by those who know from experience what it means.

She hears the hall door open and knows that the husband, who has borne the sorrow so bravely for her sake, has come home early, though his business is of the sort that knows few holidays. He comes and stands beside her and puts his arm about her, that she may know he understands. His heart is bursting with sympathy for her and with his own grief, but he forces himself to speak cheerfully, and by and by he says:

"On my way home, Mary, I saw Tim Murphy's little 5-year-old twins begging, actually begging on the street. Tim, you know, was our old office janitor. He died several months ago. I did not mean to lose sight of his family but I have been too wrapped up in my own sorrow to remember Tim's dear ones and it was a shock to me to see his little Mollie and Dollie of whom he was so proud, in such a sad plight. They used frequently to come to the office with their father and I learned to know them well. I took them home and found the mother sick, been so for several weeks; exposure and hardship the cause I think, and this accounts for their present condition. While her health bore the strain they fared better. Of course I provided for their immediate wants and do not mean to lose sight of them again, but, Mary, you should see those poor little delicate girls. Winter is coming, or has come we might say, and their worn frocks and threadbare jackets and torn shoes,-well only a woman would know how to put things to rights. I don't know how you feel about it but the warm coats and dresses and shoes that our little Mary wore,-I think she would be pleased, dear.

An hour later the Murphy family had two visitors. One was a woman who so tenderly bathed and dressed Mollie and Dollie that it seemed almost like their own mother. Soft, warm frocks were put on them by hands that trembled a little, and a few tears fell upon the shoes that were buttoned on the feet of the little orphans, but the voice that talked to them became more and more steady and the aching heart was made glad by the joy of the little ones and by the look of gratitude that lit up the face of the sick mother when she beheld the changed appearance of her babes. "You are already better, are you not, mother dear?" they asked as they kissed her, and the mother answered, "I believe I am," and added: "You see our prayers are answered." It might be well to mention here that the Murphy family was not lost sight of again. The mother was finally restored to health and was given employment by which she was enabled to care for her little ones, and she was made to feel that she had friends who were interested in her and hers, and who were ever ready to extend a helping hand.

But to return. Mr. and Mrs. Graham were strangely silent on their way home from their visit to the Murphy family. Only once were a few words spoken: "I felt that our little Mary knew about it, dear. By relieve ing the needs of others I believe we shall be able to live closer to our darling. I have dwelt in the tomball these long, weary months, and she is not there. I wish I might have understood it before." The husband made no reply, save to press the hand that lay on his arm, but he was understood.

That evening they read together: "And God shall wipe all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain.'

Far tenderer than the tenderest love of any earthly parent is God's love, and their darling is with God. The angel ranks have an added member; the heavenly choir is all the sweeter. Their hearts may never be quite satisfied—perhaps will never be this side of the city where their darling is gone, but she is safe. The little feet cannot go astray, and her presence in the eternal city will be an anchor to draw them closer to God. Hereafter their lifeboat will be steered more and more toward the things that are of heaven. The little grave will bind their hearts more closely to the eternal and God's presence will more often be sought.

Together, hand in-hand, they knelt: "Dear Father, Thou art kind and merciful to Thy children. Our hearts go out to Thee in thanksgiving. Thy will be done."

And so there was Thanksgiving in a home wherein there was a little vacant chair, because the bereaved had sought to bless others and had thus transmuted their sorrow into a reason for thanksgiving. Go thou and do likewise.

V.-How the Tramp Talked to Edgar.

This chapter is about Mr. Edgar Brown. I have been calling him a young man, but in reality he was as old as twenty-six, if not seven. So he had been in the world a long time, and he ought to have known whether he liked it or not. But he didn't know for certain, and I am just about to tell you why. His mother died when he was five years old, and his father, who was very rich, married again, of course, and when that step-mother died the father got Edgar another one. One, two, three-yes, that makes three wives Mr. Brown had: you can count 'em up yourself. The second step-mother lived on and on; so Mr. Brown died, and there she was still alive. Then what does she do but marry a gentleman of the name of Hardcattle! I hope you are keeping the connection. The second stepmother, now Mrs. Hardcattle, was just the same age as her step-son Edgar. Of course, there might have been a few days' difference, but as to years they were twins. They had always been quite friendly, but Edgar could never feel like he was the son of a lady as young as he; so he had never called her "mamma" nor asked her if he could go out to play. Well, when she married the zentleman I have mentioned (Mr. Hardcattle). Edgar didn't live with them. He was of age and he had a great deal of money, so he could live where he pleased, and he didn't have to do a thing from morning to night, he was so rich! So he traveled in Europe and went into business just for apbearances, and when he was twenty-four he fell in love with a lady as rich as himself. After going to see her a great many times, and buying ever so many tickets to take her to entertainments, he told her that he oved her. But she did not seem very much inerested and at last she thought it was about time to get married, so she married, and it wasn't Edgar Brown either. The young man hought he could never be happy again, and s for his heart he felt that it was broken. He went to London and Paris, but when he ame home everything reminded him of that young lady. If he looked out the window ie remembered how he had seen her once from that very window as she crossed the treet, and how he had seized his hat and ushed out to join her. He went to pay a visit to Mrs. Hardcattle, and there sat the ady in the parlor discussing teething with Edgar's step-mother.

Edgar determined to travel and travel and travel until he had traveled the thought of that beautiful sweetheart entirely out of is mind. So he packed up and got on the train without making up his mind where he would go. In fact, he decided to go no place in particular. He found that Mizzouryville answered that very description. It was a small town without water-works, and he stopped at the largest hotel, which came pretty near being three stories high. He resolved to stay a few days and roam about the country where there wasn't a single electric car to disturb his thoughtsnothing but cows and fences and signboards. Now, I am going to tell you something that probably you will not understand. The second day, when he came into town from a long, hot, dusty tramp about the country roads he passed Mrs. Morris' house. And there in a swing sat a girl; it was Madge Morris. Madge was thirteen, and her bair had just been curled and she had just put on a fresh apron and her new shoes, so she looked her best. But Edgar didn't notice whether her stockings were black or tan, he couldn't have told you the color of her dress; all he noticed was her fresh, bright face and youthful form. He went on to his hotel, thinking how lonely his life had been, and what he had missed by not having a whole lot of brothers and sisters to play with. Now a girl like the one he had seen in the swing-if he had a friend like that! But he had been especially unfortunate in his friendships. He had always gone with people older than himself; and they had married or moved away from his city or died. He went to bed with the "blues," but he had them so much that he rather enjoyed them, after all. You know what the blues are? It's just being real sorry for yourself and not caring what becomes of the rest of the world. It was not Edgar's fault that he was lonely and without a home, for as we have seen he would have been a married man himself if he had had his way.

The next day he took another walk in the country, coming back by Mrs. Morris'. This time he saw Madge, Pete and Letitia playing "hide-and-seek," and it made him feel worse than ever. They were so happy, so free from care—they were such children and he knew so little about children. That night he got out the five pictures of his old sweetheart which she had given him at various times, and he sat down before them -that is the way he had been trying to forget her for a year and a half. But though he stared at them hard, all he could see was little girls darting behind Mrs. Morris' house and running to an old apple tree to pat it, crying, "One, two, three for me!" The next night he did not even get out those five pictures, which I think well enough, as she was now a married lady. He saw more of the children every day, he thought of them as he took his country walks, and he forgot his first intention of only staying a few days in the little town. But he felt more than ever the lonely gap in his life, and it became his earnest desire to fill that hollow emptiness with the faces and the voices of young children. You see he didn't care much for grown-up people. He had known one young lady; and as he knew he could never love again-at least he thought he knew it-he longed to get acquainted with Madge and the others.

But as he knew nothing about the ways of children, except that those he had known asked a good many questions about one's most intimate affairs, it was two weeks before he spoke to the objects of his thoughts. It was when Madge called him in to drive away the tramp from her mother's barn.

And now Pete had plainly told him that the only way to gain their friendship was to make that tramp leave the town. Edgar smiled as he told himself he was like a knight of olden times, bidden by his lady to go and slay some dragon. At first he thought of hunting up the tramp, but he decided he had better first know what he would do with Nap when found. All kinds of wild schemes flashed through his mind: he might shut Nap up in a secret place and keep him there till he promised to leave the country; or kidnap him and haul him away in a covered wagon like a corpse; or have him arrested and sent out of the county as a vagrant. The trouble was that nobody must know that the tramp was a bother to Mrs. Morris. That troubled Edgar. Evidently the tramp had the widow somehow in his power; and if he were arrested he might be goaded to revealing a secret that Mrs. Morris had been hiding for years. Edgar wondered how the tramp could ever have learned Mrs. Morris' secret, and what kind of a secret it was that she had been guarding. It must be something of great importance, or she would never suffer a disreputable tramp like Nap to frighten her by his presence. It was a great mystery over which Edgar spent a sleepless night without once thinking of that lady who had given him a rose after the party. He studied over the situation all day; he was thinking of it as he passed Miss Dollie's house and Linda May presented him with Lucifer. As he went on, leading the dog by the whipcord and wondering what he would do with him, Edgar spied Nap slouching up the street. He hurried on as fast as he could tug Lucifer along, meaning to enter into conversation with the tramp.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

THE RICH YOUNG RULER.*

The incident of this lesson occurred very near the close of our Lord's journeyings to Peres. Following the lessons we have been studying in the gospel of Luke, the same evangelist gives us several interesting discourses of the Master, including two parables, which are passed over in our series of studies for the year. The first of these is a striking discourse on the circumstances attending the manifestation of the kingdom of the Messiah, either at the end of the Jewish age, or at the end of the world, more probably the former. This is found in chapter 17, verses 20 to 37. He then encourages his disciples to pray in faith, by the parable of the widow and the unjust judge; the lesson. of which is that, if even an unrighteous man would answer a petition because of the persistence of the suppliant, much more will a righteous God answer the prayers of his elect. Then follows the parable of the Pharisee and the publican, impressing the duty of humanity, and the discourse concerning marriage and divorce The high ground taken by the Son of Man regarding the marriage relation is in startling contrast with the loose views and practices of Christian society to-day, and no more needful reform awaits the advocacy of the Disciples of Christ than such as shall reinstate the marriage bond in its divinely ordained rank, and thus redeem the holy family life from destruction. God hasten the day. Here, too, the evangelists place the delightful incident of Jesus' blessing the little children, and the words he uses have been forever embalmed in the hearts of all true parents, and have drawn the spirits of the tender little ones to a loving faith in him as their truest friend, "Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me: for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Blessed childhood, thus forever sanctified by the word of the Only Begotten Son of

It is not strange that, after such a series of marvelous discourses as Jesus had delivered in Perea, the hearts of the wise and good should turn to him for the fuller truth and grace which they craved. Such an one now came to seek the peace which all his legal righteousness had not afforded him. Although he was yet a young man, as we learn from verse 20, his piety and diligence had won for him the highest mark of respect and confidence that could be given by his people; he had been made a Ruler (Luke 18:18), which is usually understood to mean a member of the Sanhedrin, the highest court of the Jewish nation. Nor was he wholly unworthy of this honor, so far as his outward life was concerned. He came running to the Master, which indicates his earnestness, and he fell down on his knees before him, which shows that he possessed the spirit of reverence. These facts are given us in Mark 10:17. Surely, we would have thought such a seeker will find his heart's desire. It is with almost as great sadness as that which fi'led his heart that we see him shortly turning away from Jesus, and going back to his home unbl ssed.

"Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" Such was his question. Wherein was it wanting? In this, chiefly, he looked upon Jesus as merely one of the rabbis, better and wiser than others, perhaps, but nothing more. And he looked for Jesus to lay upon him some command, of his own devising, after the fashion of other rabbis, and by the doing of which he should find that complete acceptance with God which his conscience told him he had not yet found. His error was in thinking that the simple precepts of the Word of God were insufficient to point out the way of life. Like Nasman, the Syrian leper, who looked for his leprosy to be healed through the doing of some great thing, rather than through simple obedience to the instructions of the prophet of God, this plous young Jew was seeking for some "good thing" to do, which should bring him acceptance with God, and at the same time mark him as a "perfect" man before the world.

Jesus answered him in startling fashion. Putting together the various accounts of the three evangelists, we have the Master's words: "Why callest thou me good, or askest me concerning that which is good? None is good save one, even God. Thou knowest the commandments: if thou wouldest enter into life, keep them." If you look upon me merely as a "good teacher," like the rabbis from whom you have been learning, you are mistaken. Truth is of God, and if I have any truth for men, it is because I come from God. Why have you not sought for the good way where a teacher of Israel should expect to find it, in the word of God? But this young man shows that he is not, after all, seeking for the way of life. Nothing could be plainer than the answer of Jesus, yet it does not satisfy him. He eagerly inquires: "Which commandment?" Jesus recites those that have to do with the duties of man toward his fellows, for these were clearly the ones in which this young man had fallen short. But he was unconscious of his failure, and when the Master named those great commandments of the decalogue, he complacently answers: "Master, all these things have I observed, what lack I yet?" He would be perfect, he would exhibit some form of rare consecration and obedience that should mark him out amid the multitude as a righteous man. His desire is granted. He is shown a way in which he may attain to conspicuous place among the servants of God, but it is the way of sacrifice. "If thou wouldest be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and hou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me."

He who would have conspicuous sanctity must make an entire surrender of all earthly hopes and pleasures and become a follower of him who had not where to lay his head. This seems to me an offer of Jesus to make the young man one of his chosen disciples. He saw that in him which made him love him with an intensity of feeling that was noted by his followers. But he saw, too, that this young man was in peril from his wealth, which had already become a snare to him, so as to delude him into believing that the scanty service he had already rendered his fellow mea was all that the law of God required The only way of saving him was to persuade him at once to put away his riches. If his faith in the one at whose feet he knelt was insufficient to produce this revolution there was no other means available. Hence the abrupt command, giving him no time for reflection, and taking advantage of the new impulse that had sprang up in his soul in behalf of right-ousness.

Alas! it was too late. Not even the strong emotions that had swayed his will, and brought him running to the feet of Jesus, could withstand the revulsion of feeling with which he heard the proposal that he give away all his earthly possessions. "He went away sad, because he had great possessions." He had made what Dante calls "the great refusal," and we seem to hear the echo of his sigh of disappointment as he takes his way back again to his riches, which we may be sure never afterwards satisfied him, or gave him even the pleasure he had once derived from their enjoyment. Let us hope that at some time he heard again the sweet invitation, and found strength to give up all for Jesus. But we hope without any foundation of revelation to build upon, for he disappears forever from our sight.

"How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." In the striking language of the Jewish proverb: "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God." This is a hard saying, even when we read the explanation recorded by Mark: "How hard it is for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God." No other problem seems so difficult as that of securing a consecration of wealth to the Lord. No other sin is so common in the church as the withholding of money from the service of the King. It is in deed like trying to force a camel through a needle's eye to force from the purses of some of God's professed children their wealth. The hope of the salvation of such rest. upon the assurance of Christ that what is impossible with men is possible with God. We rejoice in the belief that there are many among the rich in our churches who are at least beginning to learn their duty and privilege in this regard, and that we are on the eve of an era of generous and cheerful giving such as the world Unless such an era speedhas never seen before. ily arrives, the Church of God will be ruined by the very abundance of her wealth, which the Lord is suffering to flow into her coffers.

TOPIC FOR DECEMBER 2.

SPENDING TIME AND TAKING PAINS FOR CHRIST.

Matt. 25:1-13.

Charles Lamb declares that he always had great sympathy for the foolish virgins. They were not vicious, only unwise. And for the foolish servant who went and hid his Lord's talent in a napkin. He was not mean, only timid. And so do many of us feet. We, perhaps, placed in the same position, might do the self-same thing. We might find in ourselves the same unwisdom and timidity. Nevertheless, this sympathy of Lamb's, with all the credit it does to the gentle heart of him who wrote the Essays of Elia, does not unsay the parables. There they stand, and there the lessons they convey will ever stand. The foolish virgins must ever hear the inexorable words, "Too late, too late, ye cannot enter now." And the foolish, timid man of one talent must ever hear the hard saying: "Thou wicked and slothful servant!"

Lack of effort, neglect, sin of omission, may be just as reprehensible as a positive crime. He or she who fails to spend time and to take pains may be just as guilty befor; the Lord as he who wrongly spends time. Indeed, is not the failure to utilize time precisely the same thing as abusing time? The foolish virgins had no lack of opportunity. Their sin was lack of effort. Bestir! bestir! is the word which comes to us out of this parable.

Let me do all the good I can to as many people as I can as hard as ever I can—I may never pass this way again. Such is the proper spirit to actuate us. There are numerous things to be done in spending time for Christ.

There is first the perfecting of our own natures. They are to be burnished and brightened, filled with shining to do honor to him we serve. There is reading to be done, the message of God in the autumn woods and leaves to be listened to, divine music to be heard, and not met with dull, deaf ears. There are numerous sources open to us in this bright, speaking world in which we live from which to draw inspiration—breath for our souls, oil for our lamps.

Then there are those to whom we should impart our stores—for, like the handful of meal in the barrel, and like the cruse of oil, they will not fail in the giving forth to others. "There are lonely hearts to cherish as the days are going by." There are people who need what we possess. If we have any store of bright truth, any quantity of che-ry, exuberant life, any large outlook on the world, we shall be reprehensible if we fail to impart. The fact that the five wise virgins do not give to their foolish sisters is perhaps a blemish on their characters—though it is always possible to press a parable too far.

After all, the taking pains for Christ is simply taking pains for humanity. Doing anything for Jesus' sake is only doing it for the sake of people. Service of the Master is service such as the Master rendered to the world; it is serving men. It seems to us sometimes a shadowy and indefinite way of putting the thing—"serving Christ." But it is a very real way of putting it. If you serve a king, a true king, you serve his subjects whom he loves. If you serve a government you serve ts people. If you serve a teacher you help his students. If, then, you wish to serve the great King, Governor, Teacher, serve his people, for "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me." Doing things for Christ, taking pains for Christ, using time for Christ, is anything but a cant phrase if used in its true depth of meaning, which is, doing what Christ sought to do—give himself, in total self-forget-fulness, for the world.

Lost, Strayed or Stolen.

Who? 10,000 Disciples. Where? In Greater New York.

This is the high figure given by some of the number of Disciples who are lost, strayed or stolen in our great metropolis. Whatever the figure may be, and it varies from 1,000 to 10,000, it is certainly true that there are as many Disciples in this city outside our churches as in them. This is a lamentable fact, and accounts largely for our lack of rapid growth.

The Disciples' Club of New York, in the promotion of the social, educational and spiritual interests of our people in this city, feel called upon to grapple with this problem. We want these Disciples in our churches. We need them. They need us. They will meet with a cordial welcome.

Therefore we appeal to all disciples everywhere, if you know of any Disciples in New York who ought to be working with us let us know who they are. Send us their names and addresses, and we shall try to do the rest. We shall also be glad to be advised of the names and addresses of those intending to come to New York. We will call upon them and endeavor to have them at once connect themselves with one of our six churches here.

BOOK REVIEWS.

CHINA'S ONLY HOPE. By Viceroy Chang Chin Tung. Translated from the Chinese by Samuel I. Woodbridge. Fleming H. Revell Company.

Of books on the Chinese problem, this is certainly the latest and probably the most important. Prince Chang stands on a level with Li Hung Chang at the head of Chinese officialdom. For years he has been recognized as a leader of what may be called the reform party in China, while at the same time he is an intense patriot and does not wish China ever to become less Chinese than it is now. He recognizes fully those defects in his nation and government which weaken it, and his criticism is unsparing. The remedy which he proposes and for which he argues at length in this volume, is a revived and purified Confucianism and the acceptance of the arts and sciences of the Occident. When the book was first written a year or two ago, it was presented to the Emperor, Kwang Su, and was approved by him as "a fair and candid statement of facts," the perusal of which "will broaden the mental scope and open up methods of far seeing usefulness." At the command of the emperor, copies of the book were sent to the viceroys, governors and literary examiners of China with the order that they should push its circulation. It is said that by these means a million copies of the Chinese edition were sold. How large a part this particular volume had in bringing on the present crisis cannot be decided, but unquestionably it is the clearest statement that has yet come from an eminent Chinese source of the plans of the reform party. Perhaps it is scarcely too much to say of it, as the publishers do, that "it brought on the war."

THE INNER LIFE, By Bishop John H. Vincent.
THE LOOM OF LIFE. By F. N. Peloubet. THE IMPR VEMENT OF PERFECTION. William E. Barton, D. D. United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston, $.35 each.

These three little books of sixty or seventy pages each, issued by the United Society of Christian Endeavor, have all one purpose: the cultivation of the spiritual life of Christian Endeavorers and others. Their writers are all well known for their productions in this field. Bishop Vincent's little book is a study of Christain experience, or a consideration of Christianity as it manifests itself in states of feeling-a study of the elements of Christian consciousness. It does not advocate that form of mysticism, more common a century ago than at present, which practical-minded Christians consider dangerous. But it lays emphasis upon the fact that the divine indwelling, which is the essence of religion, expresses itself in certain states of feeling. "Even the skeptical physician," says the writer, "will ask the patient how he feels. He puts great stress on the patient's testimony. If he finds that he must discount it for the time being he nevertheless asks the question time and time again, 'How do you feel?' "

Dr. Peloubet's book contains two helpful essays, the first under the title already given, the second "If Christ were a Guest in our Home," carrying into the life of the home the same method with which W. T. Stead treated the life of the city in his somewhat sensational book, "If Christ Came to Chicago,"

By "The Improvement of Perfection," Dr. Barton does not wish to be understood as advocating any special theories of "holiness" or "sanctification." He is treating rather of going on to perfection and of the progressive development of character. Such chapter and section titles as "Character's Earned Increment," "The Par Value of a Life," "Life's Compound Interest," "The Par-

Buffalo.

Touisville.

"Hear ye the parable of the shingles. A shingle is three times as long as the space it covers. It has for its first duty to cover its own little spot of roof, and do it well; its second duty is to complete the strip of equal width that is made by the courses below; and the next is to furnish a tight foundation for the courses above to be laid upon. Now, shingles are of different widths, even as one life has one talent, another two, and another five. And the lives of men adjoining one another in a given generation, and doing their work, some well and others with knots and cracks, these are the shingles of a single course. And the generations mount slowly and steadily upward toward the ridge. And underneath are the rafters of God's eternal purposes. So may my life align itself with the good and the true of my own age, and be nailed fast to the eternal truths that are God's own! It is not my duty to hold up the roof; but there is one small spot upon it, whose length is measured by the years of my life, and whose breadth is made by my best effort; by the grace of God I will make that one spot secure!"

JUST TO HELP. Some Poems for Every Day. By

Readers of Christian Endeavor literature are familiar with the name of Dr. Wells, though, perhaps, not as a poet. The poems in this little volume breathe, throughout, the spirit of quiet and cheerful devotion, coming close enough to the common things of life to make a direct appeal to the heart and rising high enough to lift the common things of life into the realm of true poetry.

HOPKINS

Jacob Hopkins was born in Stark County, Indiana, March 4, 1832. In 1855 he removed to Wisconsin and was married to Jane Marston in 1858. He served faithfully as a soldier in the Civil War. In 1896 he came to Cherokee County, Iowa, where he has since resided. He had been a member of the church since 1878. His death occurred Nov. 5, 1900, at Hoxie, Kausas, at the home of his son. He leaves a wife, a son and daughter. The remains were brought back to Cleghorn where the funeral took place Nov. 8th, conducted by the writer. E. M. MILLER.

MARSHALL.

Grandmother Mary Rodebush Marshall was born in Pennsylvania in 1803, and died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Lydia Ray, Oct. 22, 1900, near Carrollton, Ohio. She reached the remarkable age of 97 years with a clear mental vision. Her faithful companion, Joshua Marshall, Sr., passed away 24 years ago. She saw nearly all the progress of our closing century. She came in a wagon around Horseshoe Bend when no railroad was there. She was the mother of twelve children, eight of whom survive her. All grew to maturity and nearly all were and are members of maturity and nearly all were and are members of the Church of Christ. Recently she sat in a group for a picture in which five generations were rep-resented. She was greatly beloved by the whole community for her plain, frank and honest life. She has left the stamp of her transparent charac-ter on her children. Funeral service was appropriately conducted by the pastor, Bro. Johnson, at Mt. Olivet Church, Carroll Co., Ohio. LEVI MARSHALL.

STROBEL.

Edith May Strobel was born Feb. 13, 1871, in Monmouth, Polk Co., Ore., died in Spokane, Oct. 29, 1900 aged 29 years, 8 months and 16 days. Was married to J. A. Strobel Sept. 6, 1894. Became a Christian in August, 1895. From the day of her obedience to the gospel of Christ she was a devoted Christian worker, was kind and obedient, made friends with all she met. She leaves a devoted husband, a widowed mother, brothers and sisters and a large circle of friends to murn her. The writer preached her funeral in Christian The writer preached her funeral in Christian Church in Tekoa, Wash.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose. Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the sys-

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and odorous vegeta

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of the so lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in the stomach and bowels, and to clear the c mplexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordidary charcoal tablets."

CHRISTMAS CANTATAS AND CONCERT EXERCISES

It is now high time that the Sunday-school and Junior Endeavor Societies were preparing for the special entertainments or exercises that they expect to give on or near Christmas. We have selected to offer to our patrons the following:

All Hail to Santa Claus. A Cantata by Chas. H. Gabriel. The cast includes fourteen persons, besides groups of Filipinos, Cubans, Japanese and Craftsmen. The music is bright and catching, is not very difficult, and is within the range of young voices. This is a new cantata just published. We believe it is destined to become very popular. The book contains 48 pages, including both score and libretto. Per copy, 30 cents; per dozen, $3.00.

Young Santa Claus. A Cantata. Music by J. H. Rosecrans; libretto by Annie D Bradley. Mr. Rosecrans, best musical work has been done in his popular cantatas. "Young Santa Claus" is one of his best productions. Both words and music are bright. We heartily recommend this cantata to Sunday-schools looking for a first-class Christmas entertainment. elaborate as a cantata. Per copy, 25 cents; per dozen, $2.40.

The Christmas Pilgrim. A Concert Exercise. Words by Jessie Brown Pounds; music by J. H. Fillmore. This is a sixteen page pamphlet containing a number of tuneful songs suitable for the Christmas season, and bright recitations in rhyme. "The Christmas Pilgrim" is just the thing for the Sunday-school that does not care to attempt anything so Per copy, 5 cents; per dozen, 50 cents.

The Wonderful Child. By W. W. DowLing. A Christmas Service which is based on the prophetic declaration concerning the Child whose name should be called Wonderful. Per copy 5 cents; per dozen, 50 cents.

The Saving of Money by the use

Baking Powder is considerable. Royal is economical, because it possesses more leavening power and goes further.

Royal saves also because it always makes fine, light, sweet food; never wastes good flour; butter and eggs.

More important still is the saving in health. Royal Baking Powder adds antidyspeptic qualities to the food.

There is no baking powder so economical in practical use, no matter how little others may cost, as the Royal Imitation baking powders almost invariably contain alum. Alum makes the food unwholesome.

Detective: Did you see a man and woman driving past here in a buggy about an hour ago?

Mrs. Blank: Yes.

Detective: Ah, we're getting on track of them! What kind of a horse was it?

Mrs. Blank: They were driving so fast I didn't notice that. But the woman had on a Scotch mohair and wool jacket of turquoise blue, last year's style, with stitched lines, a white pique skirt with deep circular flounce; a satin straw hat, tilted and rather flat, trimmed with hydrangeas and loops of pale blue surah, and her hair was done up pompadour. That's all I had time to see.

Hunker. I asked old Mr. Munn if I might pay my addresses to his daughter. Spratts. What did he say? Hunker. He suggested that I should pay my debts first.

Book Notes.

The new year is close at hand. It will be t first year of a new century, too, and if it is good thing to "turn over a new leaf" at the beg ning of a year, how much more fitting is it start right on a new century! With this idea a a text, we proceed to the following suggestions:

Churches ought to begin the new year and not century right by adopting business-like method in their business affairs. The records of the congregation should be properly kept in the proposition of a place. First-class hymn books should be secured and used. Adequate and suitable conmunion ware should be had. All these things, at all other church supplies, we handle and sell. There have but the best goods, at lowest prices.

Sunday-schools should begin the new centuright by using only the best Sunday-school suplies. Nothing is so cheap—in the full meaning of the word—as cheap literature, of any kin About two-thirds of our schools are now using the best supplies published, but we are anxious about the other one-third. We want these latter have the best supplies, too. (N. B. The best suplies are those we publish. This statement has the endorsement of the great majority of the leading Sunday school workers among us. If yo doubt it, let us send you samples.)

Christian Endeavor Societies should start the new year right by securing prayer-meeting top cards for every member, and laying in a free and complete supply of pledge cards, invitation cards, copies of the constitution and by-laws, et We have all these. If you are interested, drows a postal card, and receive our complete catalogue.

Preachers should resolve that during the ne year they will read a number of new books, the their preaching may have some freshness and their congregations be less somnolent. Good books are cheaper now than ever before. On new General Catalogue is full of splendid bood bargains, which especially appeal to the preachers.

All our readers and patrons should resolve t give more attention to good literature. The supplying of really good literature is our specialty. The well-informed man or woman should reahistory, biography, fiction, poetry, science, the ology—all; but only the best in each departmen of literature. We can supply you with any boo you wish, whether we publish it ourselves or no Send us your orders.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The serious illness of Senator Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota, is particularly unfortunate at this time, not only because it puts in jeopardy the life of a man who has rendered eminent service to the country, but because now, when Congress is about to open, a task devolves upon him as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee which can scarcely be discharged by any other member of the Senate. At the close of the last session several matters were left over on account of the indisposition of the Republican leaders to permit, on the verge of a presidential election, any action which might create new issues or furnish new campaign arguments. Among these were the Hav-Pauncefote treaty, the ratification of which must, in all likelihood, precede the passage of the Nicaragua Canal bill, and several treaties of commercial reciprocity, including those with France and the Argentine Republic. Senator Davis is the only member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations who is thoroughly conversant at once with the commercial and legal bearings of these international questions. In his absence most of the burden will fall upon Senators Frye and Dolliver. But neither of these will be able quite to take the place of Mr. Davis in explaining the workings of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

A preliminary meeting of some members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House is now being held in Washington, with a view to a reduction of the war tax. The Secretary of the Treasury believes that between fifteen and thirty millions can be spared. The probability of an appropriation for the Nicaragua Canal and an increase of the military appropriation (an increase over the normal expenditure though a decrease from the present) renders it impossible to make a greater reduction. The members of the committee are being besieged by representatives of various industries which wish to be relieved of the special taxes now levied upon them under the War Revenue Bill. The policy of the committee will probably be-at least it ought to be-to remove those taxes which cause the most annoyance to the public without producing a corresponding amount of revenue. The stamp tax as applied to telegrams and bank cheques means about two cents worth of nuisance for one cent of revenue. It is a plain case of great cry and little wool.

The end of the rainy season in the Philippines is expected to mark the beginning of a more aggressive campaign against the rebels. The President has sent instructions to General MacArthur to the effect that the time is up for the use of gentle means. Like the old man in the primer, we have found that there is no efficacy in throwing tufts of grass and must now try what virtue there may be in stones. Unfortunately, the beginning of the dry season has also stirred up the insurgents to renewed endeavors, and hostilities have been more brisk than for some months. There seems to be a miscalculation somewhere in the prediction that the rebellion would end as soon as the reelection of President McKinley was assured. But it may be that this is the storm before the calm. It is rumored that Generals Mac-Arthur, Grant and Bates may be recalled to the United States, at their own request, and that other commanders will be sent out to finish the campaign.

The Cuban Constitutional Convention is still busy organizing itself and adopting rules of procedure. The committee on this subject submitted a list of 131 rules, several of which caused warm discussion, especially the one in regard to the holding of secret sessions. It was finally decided that the sessions shall be public except when the convention is dealing with matters which concern its own decorum or its members or when, on the petition of five members, the convention shall vote to hold any particular session behind closed doors. The question of the relation of Cuba to the United States and whether this ought to be considered prior to the framing of the Constitution, has also been the occasion of many words. But most of the leaders hold—and rightly it seems to us—that they should frame the Constitution first and talk about relations afterward. Secretary Root has just returned from his trip to Cuba.

The American attitude in favor of lenience in the treatment of China is growing more and more pronounced. Upon two points our government insists: First, that China shall not be forced to inflict such punishment upon her high officials as will seriously endanger the life of her own government; second, that under no pretext shall the integrity of the Chinese Empire be sacrificed or the open door to commerce closed by the seizure of territory by any Power. The logical connection between these two requirements seems to have been perceived by our state department before it was fully appreciated by the other governments; for Germany, while joining with England in a pledge that the Enpice shall not be divided, has been foremost in demanding such punitive measures as would render a Chinese revolution almost inevitable and the division of the territory perhaps necessary. And Great Britain is believed to be still inclined toward a policy of rigor rather than of lenience in dealing with the Boxer leaders. Minister Conger has been instructed not to insist upon the decapitation of the eleven princes judged responsible for the Boxer outrages-not because they do not deserve it, but because China could not stand it. A note embodying the two points above mentioned has been despatched to the other Powers and it is confidently expected that they will accept the suggestion. In spite of this plea for lenience, there is a general belief that the imperial edict of November 13, which decrees the punishment of princes Tuan and Chwing, is both inadequate and insincere.

The report that General Kitchener, who has been recommended to the Queen for promotion to the rank of Lieutenant General in order that he may succeed General Roberts in command in South Africa, had decided to depopulate the towns of the Boers as the only means of crushing out their resistance, is followed promptly by the tidings of Boer uprising of a more serious and formidable sort than had been supposed possible. Lord Roberts reports that the enemy is very active in the southern part of the Orange River colony and is giving much trouble by cutting railroads and telegraph lines. DeWet is still exhibiting his genius for being everywhere at once and is harassing the British commands by his swift raids and elusive retreats. In one of these raids thirty British soldiers from General Littleton's command were captured and a dozen killed or wounded. Following this successful movement, Betha and DeWet succeeded in joining their forces and gave General French a lively chase. French has retired to Johannesburg and it is even said that Bloemfontein is threatened and that the whole Orange River Colony will have to be subdued over again before the work in the Transvaal can go on. It seems to be true, as Kitchener says, that there can be no pacification so long as the whole population remains hostile.

On Thursday of last week Mr. Kruger arrived at Marseilles, France, and met a triumphant reception. Every reasonable precaution had been taken to prevent the ovation to Kruger from being turned into a directly anti-British demonstration and the populace had been warned that any person who vented his enthusiasm through "a bas l'Angleterre" instead of the unobjectionable "vive Kruger," should be taken in hand by the police. In general, the crowd not only at Marseilles but at all the points at which he stopped-Tarascon, Avignon, Valencia, Lyons, Macol and Dijon-on the way to Paris, did quite well-considering that they were French. It was a series of tremendous ovations of a semi-official sort and there was a praiseworthy effort not to make the reception any more of an affront to England than the necessities of the situation demanded. Kruger is the popular idol at present in France. and there is no people in the world which is so thoroughly competent to go into ecstasies over a lion of the hour as the French.

The Czar of Russia, whose reported attack of typhoid fever last week set all the world to wondering what would happen in the dire event of his death, is still in a critical condition. The turning point cannot be said to have been passed. The Czar's youth is in his favor, but his constitution is not naturally strong. In spite of the deceptive appearance of his imperial regalia, it is easily noticed, when he is seen surrounded by other men, that he is below medium height and somewhat frailly built. The order has gone forth that special prayers shall be said in all Russian churches for his recovery. The present heir-apparent to the Russian throne is Grand Duke Michael, the Czar's brother.

A convention of the Interstate Commerce League is to meet in St. Louis this week, with about two hundred delegates from all parts of the country. The purpose of the meeting is to develop sentiment in favor of passing the amendment, known as the Cullom Bill, to the present Interstate Commerce Law. As the situation is at present, the commission which is crea'ed and maintained by that law is entirely impotent. It can express its opinion in any case of alleged violation of this law, but it has no authority to cause anything to be done. The chief object of the proposed amendment is to remove this disability and give the commission some real power as the executor of the law. A hope is entertained that the amendment can be passed at the coming session of Congress.

Another notable game of that horrid and barbaric foot-ball has been played between the elevens of Yale and Harvard, virtually finishing the season-and also virtually finishing the Harvard team. The brutal bruisers met on the Yale field. They alternate between New Haven and Cambridge now, instead of playing at Springfield, Mass., as they used to. A great many thousand fanatics, wearing the crimson or the blue, witnessed the hideous exhibition and seemed to enjoy it. It was noticeable that the wearers of the crimson were blue after the game, but nobody was seriously injured in mind, body or estate. For the benefit of brutal and benighted lovers of the game elsewhere, it may be stated that it was a good game and that the score was: Yale, 28; Harvard, 0.

An enthusiastic advocate of rural free delivery of mail is found in the First Assistant Postmaster General, W. M. Johnson, whose annual report, which has just been made public, deals largely with this subject The system has been a great success so far as it has been adopted, he says, and ought to be extended. The appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year, 1899-1900, was less than half a million dollars and for the following year one and three-fourths millions. An increased appropriation will be asked for next year. The service, says Mr. Johnson, does not demand any excessive expenditure. The average route of a rural carrier is twenty five miles, no part of which is traveled twice in one day. The pay is from $400 to $500 a year. no civil service examination, but evidence of trustworthy character is insisted upon. The present policy is to extend the system as rapidly as possible with a view to inaugurating rural free delivery in all the wellsettled parts of the United States.

Sir Arthur Sullivan, the musical composer, died in London on Nov. 22. His death was sudden and resulted from heart failure. Born in 1842, the son of a musician, he early chose his life calling. At the age of twenty he returned to London, after two years of study in Leipsic, with his music to Shakespeare's "Tempest." The production of this at the Crystal Palace marked the beginning of his reputation. Above every other quality one must mark the versatility of that musical genius which could produce compositions so widely different and each so excellent in its class as 'The Lost Chord," "Pinafore" and "The Mikado."

The London underground railroads are to be changed from steam power to electricity, and it is possible that the snoky gloom of those tunnels may be considerably alleviated. There are fifty miles of track to which the change will apply, and the approximate cost of introducing electricity as the motive power is estimated at twenty five million dollars. Plans and schemes have been solicited from electrical manufacturers and contractors, expressly including those in the United States.

To be patriotic without narrowing one's human sympathies to fit the boundaries of a political division, to preserve a proper racial pride without running into a narrow "particularism" which fails to recognize the worth of a man who speaks any language but our own-this is one of the most difficult things for a man of spirit and loyalty. The American people have not been beyond criticism in this respect, and the Jews have, in the non-missionary character of their religion, shown the same spirit with even more intensity. A Jewish paper recently, in speaking of the tendency in some synagogues to secure preachers who would attract Gentiles, said: "The young Jewish preachers in America to-day need no longer cater to the tastes and religious inclinations of non-Jews in order to br ng about a better feeling between Jews and non-Jews. What we need to-day is a re-awakening of Jewish sentiment amongst the Jews. For whom do we build temples? For whose spiritual benefit do we pay large salaries? For the spiritual regeneration of our own children and of our own men and women." It is a fortunate thing for the Gentile world that the Apostle Paul was willing to "cater to the tastes of non-Jews;" he called it being "all things to all men."

American manufacturers and those directly or indirectly connected with them (which means nearly everybody in the country) have abundant cause for thanksgiving in view of the commercial conditions which now prevail. Statistics are dry things, but often they have meaning. For example, when a reader with imagination reads the statement that the exports from this country for the first ten months of 1900 exceed those of the corresponding months of last year by $166,000,000, and are double those of 1894, he will instantly frame a mental picture of busy factories and full dinner pails. (There is no politics in a dinner pail, full or empty, and we are not raising the question of the cause of the prosperity.) Estimate for yourself the probable cost of the labor which goes into each dollar's worth of those exports, and say whether the American workingman is not better off than he was. The amount of our imports is, of course, also increasing; even the importation of raw materials for manufactures (such as rubber, tin, hemp, raw silk and chemicals) would insure that, but the balance of trade is increasingly in our favor. Our exports of manufactured articles alone have more than doubled in four years. Moreover, the exported products of both factory and farm have brought higher prices than last year. Great Britain's exports have increased less rapidly than ours, and the other great nati ns are far down the scale. Truly there is much to be thankful for in the commercial world.

NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.

The appointment of a national Thanksgiving day is a distinctly religious act. A nation does not give thanks to itself but to a Power higher than itself, even to the God of nations. The observance of such a day, therefore, should be in a religious spirit. A celebrated Jewish Rabbi has objected to the use of the word "Christian" in President McKinley's Thanksgiving Proclamation. This is narrow and sectarian. It is a prejudice that even the Jews ought to overcome. There is no God to worship or to whom we can give thanks for his beneficent influence in molding the life of our nation, except the God revealed by Jesus Christ. Even the Jews cannot love or worship any other God.

It is not too much, then, to say that the recognition of a national Thanksgiving day is a Christian act. It is the influence of Christ's teaching concerning God and man that has wrought so mightily in behalf of human rights. Jesus taught the universal Fatherhood of God. This implies the universal brotherhood of man. This means that "All men were created free and equal. and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and pursuit of happiness." This is the gist of the Declaration of Independence. It is the spirit which founded our American Republic. It is the spirit which animates and perpetuates it. But it is not more certain that this truth came from Jesus Christ than that vegetable growth results from the rays of the sun.

If, then, we truly appreciate our country and its institutions; if we are really grateful for the heritage of civil and religious liberty which we received from our fathers; if we recognize the truth that we hold in trust this heritage of freedom to be transmitted to generations yet unborn; if we realize that, as we are indebted to God for the principles on which our government is established, so we must look to Him for that providential guidance which has been so marked hitherto in our national history, then it will be an easy and natural thing for us to meet in our accustomed places of worship on the day appointed, to give thanks to Almighty God for all that we have achieved as a nation, for all that we enjoy, and for whatever influence we have been able to exert upon other nations and peoples of the world in the direction of human rights and human liberty.

Let us thank Him for the ripened harvests which have rewarded the husbandmen and which are ample for the material needs of the people; for the general prosperity which e igns throughout e country; for the growth of education and enlightenment; for progress of invention and useful discovery; for the growing sense of human brotherhood; for the extension of the kingdom of God at home and abroad; for the increasing unity of all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ; for a flag that waves over a united country, and has brought deliverance and freedom to the oppressed peoples of other lands who are to-day rejoicing under its protection; for a nation that, in a great international crisis, is exercising its mighty influence in behalf of justice and righteourness, and even of generosity, toward a less enlightened nation. For all these and the manifold blessings which God has bestowed upon us as individuals and families, let us give Him sincere and hearty thanks, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

"GIVE ATTENTION TO READ-ING."

This admonition of Paul to Timothy, his son in the gospel, is one that has an accumulated force and meaning in our day. The few parchments or books accessible to Timothy have been multiplied by infinity. The books to day contain the accumulated wisdom of the world along the several lines of research and investigation. To be ignorant of books is to deprive oneself of the treasured knowledge gleaned from centuries and millenniums of experience and of intellectual labor of those who have gone before us, and have grappled with the same great problems which confront us.

Some sage of modern times has warned the people against the danger of reading good books. No one, he argued, should be content to read a good book unless it be the best on that subject. One cannot read all the good books in the world, even on any one subject of importance. He ought, therefore, to read the best books on any given subject, if he can find out what books these are. But, on this point, it must be said that what is the best book for one man or one class of men, may not be the best for another man or another class of men. This makes a variety of books necessary. It is of the first importance, however, that one read very discriminatingly if he would avoid wasting time and money on inferior books.

Some people are so confused by the multiplicity of books being turned out in our day, that they lose heart and fail to read very much of anything. This is like a hungry man's refusing to partake of a richly-laden table because he cannot eat everything in sight. There are a great many limitations to be considered which reduce very largely the number of books which we need to read. Most people prefer a book in their native tongue. That cuts off a large number. A vast number of books are of a technical nature and on special subjects in which we are not interested. That greatly reduces the number of books which one needs to take into consideration. Many books are written by men who have hobbies to ride, which generally fall stillborn. Others are out of date. Any book is out of date when a better one on the same subject makes its appearance. Thousands of books never had any reason for being born, except the ambition of authorship. These will never be "born again." And so it is wonderful the number of books one can omit from his reading without suffering any appreciable loss.

But there are books appearing every year which one can hardly afford to miss reading -books of fiction, history, biography, theology, and books dealing with the various social and religious problems of our time. It is great mental impoverishment for persons to deny themselves the fertilizing thoughts and facts of these able writers. Their own minds would be vastly enriched and made more fruitful by coming in contact with these vigorous thinkers in various fields of investigation. Many plead lack of time and means for such reading. But books are cheap, and we generally find time to do what we most wish to do. A little planning, and some economizing in means and time in other directions, would put such persons in communication with the ablest minds of the past and present.

It is the aim of the Christian Evangelist to encourage and foster the reading of the best books, and to make its literary department to some extent a guide in the choice of such books as are worth reading. The present issue of the paper gives special prominence to new books, and may be regarded as a prophecy of larger things in the same direction.

WHAT MUST I DO TO BE SAVED?

(Acts 16:31; Matt. 10: 32; Rom. 10: 10; 1 Peter 3: 21; 2 Peter 1: 5-8.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Dec. 5.]

CENTRAL TRUTH: Salvation is God through Christ, but there are conditions upon which men must avail themselves of this salvation.

The question, "What must I do to be saved?" is a momentous one. It implies, in the first place, that man is in need of salvation, and the consciousness of that need. It implies a conviction of sin, for it is this conviction of sin that ever extorts the cry, "What must I do to be saved?" Moreover, the question implies that there is a salvation brought within the reach of sinful men, and the inquiry is as to how one may accept such salvation and rejoice in its blessings. The several Scriptures cited above are intended to guide the inquiring soul into the way of salvation.

In answer to the inquiry which constitutes the topic for this meeting, Paul sums the answer up in the comprehensive words, "Believe on the Lorl Jesus and thou shalt be saved, thou and thy house." This is the answer which every true minister of the gospel must give to this question. "It is a true saying and worthy of all acceptation that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." This being true, the way of salvation lies through faith in Him as the great Deliverer from sin. "There is no other name given under heaven or among men whereby we can be saved." The only faith that saves from sin is faith in Jesus Christ—a faith that links the soul with Him in loving and loyal obedience. It is often necessary to explain to those to whom this answer is given what is ment by believing on Christ and what is involved in it. And so we read in this instance that Paul and Silas "spake the word of the Lord unto the jailer and to those that were in his house," and that as a result of this further teaching the jailer and his household were baptized "the same hour of the night."

The passage, Matt. 10:32, pronouncing a blessing upon those who confess Christ "before men," is not to be limited to the primary confession of Christ as Lord. Perhaps it does not refer to that directly at all, but rather to the duty of confessing Christ in the presence of His enemies, and when we have been assailed because of our allegiance to Him as His disciples. Nevertheless, it is entirely proper and even necessary that there should be an original confession of Christ, for we learn from Rom. 10:10 that "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." In the same connection we learn what the nature of that confession is: "Because if thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." What the heart believes the mouth must confess, both for the sake of him who makes the confession, that he may be committed openly to Christ, and for the benefit of others who may be influenced by his example. It ought to be impressed, however, that this confession of Christ with the mouth avails nothing except as it is an expression of the heart's truest convictions, and of its purpose as well, to follow Him who is confessed. This purpose to forsake sin and to follow Christ is true repentance, without which there can be no Christian life. No faith is genuine that is not accompanied by a true repentance, and no repentance is true that does not issue in a changed life.

The quotation from Peter above cited shows that there is another act which has a place in the divine plan of bringing the believer into the knowledge and joy of forgiveness. Referring to the salvation of Noah and his family as being saved in the ark "through water," he adds: "which also after a true likeness doth now save you, even baptism, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh but the interrogation of a good conscience toward God through the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Baptism, he declared, is not an act for outward purification, but pertains to the conscience. It is the inquiry of the soul after a good conscience—a seeking for the assurance of sins forgiven. It has pleased God in His wisdom and love to grant us this visible symbol and pledge of the forgiveness of our sins, and to regard it, as some of our religious neighbors seem to do, as a work of law, instead of a condition of grace, is to miss the whole spirit and intent of the institution. Equally in error are they who ascribe to baptism any magical virtue or regenerative power which works some supernatural change on the person baptized. It is God's appointed means of bringing the believing soul into a condition of open surrender to Him, and of the assurance of forgiveness of sins. As such let it be maintained as a divine ordinance in the integrity of its form and meaning.

But even this is only the beginning of the Christian life. For after the believer has thus been admitted through confession and baptism into the fellowship of the saints, it remains for us to "work out our salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do His good pleasure." Peter's way of expressing that fact, in the passage given above for our study, is by giving diligence "in our faith to supply virtue, and in virtue knowledge, and in knowledge temperance, and in temperance patience, and in patience godliness, and in godliness love of the brethren, and in love of the brethren love."* This means a growth in the divine life which is essential to the realization of that full salvation which is offered to us in Christ. It is just here that so many of us fail. Many seem to act as if they supposed that coming into the church was the end of Christian effort instead of the beginning. The work of adding these Christian graces to our lives is one of far greater magnitude and requires far greater patience and diligence than compliance with the conditions which have been previously mentioned as necessary to bring us into the church of God. Let none of us be content with beginning the Christian life, but resolve rather to "go on to perfection," to the end that we may not only have life but have it "more abundantly." So shall there be "richly supplied unto you the entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

DDAVED

Almighty God, our gracious Father, we thank Thee for the gift of Christ and for the great salvation which Thou hast offered to us in Him. We thank Thee for the great leve which lies behind this offer of salvation, and which has brought it within our reach. We thank Thee for the plain way which Thou hast given us in Thy word by which we may releive forgiveness of sins, and the hope of life everlasting. Grant, we beseech Thee, that having accepted Jesus Christ as our Savior, we may follow Him in the attainment of all those virtues and graces which shone so conspicuously in His life, and in all paths of lowly and useful service into which we may be called. And finally, wit Thou admit us with a joyful welcome into Thy eternal and triumphant kingdom through riches of grace in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen!

*Note: It would be a good plan to assign these seven graces to as many different members, beforehand, and have each one write a two or three minute paper on the topic assigned him. These could be assigned to persons not accustomed to speaking in the prayer meeting.

Editor's Easy Chair

From Richmond, where we spent a delightful Lord's day with as warm-hearted a people as we ever met, it is only a halfday's ride on the Southern Railway to Danville, Va. Leaving Richmond at noon M n day, in company with Brother J. C. Reynolds, a young preacher who represents the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST and our publishing company in that State, we reached Danville at 6 o'clock in the evening. While the train was crossing the river that flows through the city we inquired the name of the stream and were told that it is "the river Dan." The name had a strangely familiar sound and we soon remembered that it was associated with stories which had come down in our family tradition concerning the deeds of one who, in his daywhich must have been about the first of the present century or the latter part of the preceding one-was "a mighty hunter." He was the grandfather of the writer hereof, and lived in North Carolina, in the mountains of which the river Dan has its source. The bear stories which formed a part of the evening fireside entertainment of our boyhood days had their scene laid mostly on "the river Dan." The hero of these stories moved later into Eastern Tennessee, from which state he migrated to Southwest Missouri with his youngest son, at the age of 100 years-rather an advanced period of life to "go West." But he lived four years longer and was "gathered to his fathers." But this is a digression. By the failure of a letter of Brother Reynolds to reach Danville in time we were relieved of the duty of preaching in the evening, which on account of the rain we did not regret. We had a most enjoyable visit with Brother J. A. Spencer, pastor of the church there, and his family, with whom we spent the night. The influence of such a devout man as Brother Spencer and his Christian family must be a blessing to any community. Leaving Brother Reynolds there to prosecute the good work of sowing the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST all through Virginia, we pushed our way on further South.

The colored man who drove us to the residence of Bro. Spencer and called for us next morning at 4 o'clock, was an interesting type of his race. In answer to a question from us he said, "Yes, boss, wuz heah fo' de wah, and helped to make de fortifications." "How are the colored people about here getting on, uncle?" "I declar, boss, I'se afeard many of 'em are worse off now dan dey wuz fo' de wah." "That probably comes from their having had a wrong idea of freedom; perhaps many thought it meant idleness." "Yes, boss, and I'se afeard dere is a heap of 'em thinks de same yit." He went on to say that he had raised five children and had educated them and that two of his daughters were teaching in the public school and that he had learned a great many things from his children. One can not travel through the South, with his eyes open, without realizing that the race problem is a much more difficult one than has usually been supposed by people of the Nor h. Another half day's ride brought us to Columbia, capital of South Carolina. A few hours between trains here to visit some relatives gave us an opportunity of seeing something of the capital of the Palmetto state. The capitol building, begun on a grand scale before the war, has never yet been completed. Recently, however, an appropriation has been made for its comple tion, and plans have been accepted and the work is in progress. Mr. Frank Walter, architect, whom, with his wife, formerly Miss Kate Garrett, of Camp Point, Ill., we were visiting, and who is here in connection with this enterprise, showed us the splen lid fluted columns which have been lying on the ground since before the war, and some finely polished and carved granite stones which have been patiently waiting all these years for that revival of prosperity which would enable the state to complete the splendid structure. The time has come and the renewal of work on this capitol may be regarded as fairly typifying that general revival of material prosperity which is rapidly developing a new South-new in industrial enterprise and manufacturing interest. The state capitol bears the marks of two or three of Sherman's cannon balls, but in the reconstruction of the building these will probably disappear, just as the alienations between the two sections have largely disappeared in the new baptism of patriotism which our country has recently undergone.

It is only a few hours' ride from Columbia to Augusta, our destination. We arrived on Tuesday evening too late to attend the opening session at which J. S. Lamar, the patriarch and sage of Georgia, had read a historical paper on the jubilee anniversary of the inauguration of our cause in Augusta. The address is to be printed, however, and we are promised a copy of it and will give our readers the gist of it, at least. It was spoken of as a most important paper, written in classic English. We have asked Bro. Lamar to report the salient features of the convention for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. There are rather more organizations represented in a Georgia Convention than we have in most of the states. Besides the State Missionary Convention and the C. W. B. M., there is the W. S. G. M., another missionary organization of the sisters for state work. There is also an Educational Board to raise funds to educate young men for the ministry -a good work, we should say. All these organizations reported their work for the past year. The State Convention was presided over by W. A. Chastain, and State Evangelist H. C. Combs read an encouraging report of his work during the past year, showing splendid results from the labor and There have been 700 or means expended. 800 additions during the year within the state, which is a good per cent. of gain, our entire membership in the state being only about 12,000.

The addresses from speakers outside the state were by foreign missionaries, F. E. Meigs, of China, E. S. Stevens, of Japan, and Miss Bessie Farrar, of India,—splendid representatives of our foreign missionary army -B. L. Smith, of the A. C. M. S., and the editor of this paper. They heard us all not only with patience, but with interest in our respective messages. This number of outside speakers was not the result of any lack of home talent, as was evident from the presence of many able brethren and sisters of the state. They felt it would be good for them to hear representatives from other fields. This absence of a narrow provincialism is one of the signs of progress, as it is also evidence of previous sowing by large-minded men. Nothing tends more to the promotion of unity and intellectual stimulation than this interchange of ideas between brethren representing widely-separated fields of labor and different points of view. This fact alone would justify conventions if there were no other motive. This convention, like that of Virginia, was said to be the largest and best in the history of the state. We were pleased to see the number of bright, promising young preachers present, beside some of the old wheelhorses, such as J. S. Lam r, Dr. A. G. Thomas, C. P. Williamson and W. F. Watkins. The spirit of the convention was good, and it was evident that things are on the upgrade in Georgia.

The convention was held in the splendid edifice of the First Church in Augus'a-a monument to the liberality of our lamented Sister Tubman-and the church served a bountiful free dinner each day in the building to all the delegates and visitors. Besides this they entertained them in their homes. It was our good fortune to share the hospitality of the elegant home of J. R. Lamar and wife, the latter being the daughter of our lamented brother, W. K. Pendleton. Brother Lamar is the son of our widely known and greatly loved J. S. Lamar, and is one of the most prominent lawyers in the state, a man of ability and character. Both he and his wife occupy a position of influence in the social and literary life of Augusta, and are also loyal members of the church. We had a pleasant but brief visit also in the home of Brother L. G. Thomas, one of our Georgia readers. He is deeply interested in the cotton manufacturing interest in Augusta, as well as a pillar in the church. We also enjoyed the liberty of the parsonage, occupied by A. B. Phillips, the popular pastor of the church which was the host of the convention. Bro. Phillips is doing a fine work in Augusta.

Speaking of cotton manufacturing, Georgia stands at the head of the southern states in this line of industry, and Augusta is one of the chief manuacturing centers of the state. We regretted that lack of time forbade our visiting some of these cotton mills, but we learned that this industry is growing in the South, and it is only a question of time when the East will find itself beaten in the competitive race with the South in its cotton manufacturing. We were glad to note the spirit of hopefulness that pervades the people of the South in view of the brighter outlook for that section of the country, industrially. It is safe to predict a remarkable development of these southern states within the next decade. The race problem will be solved in due time, though it will require patience, wisdom and a very diligent and united effort on the part of the people of the whole country to lift up the colored population of these states to the plane of intelligent and useful citizenship. It is the problem not of the South alone, but of the whole nation. It was an act of Congress, now generally recognized even at the North to have been ill advised, that granted immediate and universal suffrage to the freedmen of the South. The results of this mistake should be borne, as far as possible, by the whole people, though of necessity its chief burden rests upon the white people of the South.

The return trip from Augusta by way of Columbia and Asheville, N. C., where we spent a few hours in this "land of the sky," and on through the mountains, alongside of the roaring French Broad River, gave us some of the finest mountain scenery to be found in our country. We had a glimpse of the far-famed "Biltmore," the castle of Mr. Vanderbilt, near Asheville, and from the summit of Battery Park and the verandah of the splendid hotel that crowns it, we had a magnificent view of the mountain peaks and mountain ranges which, for grandeur and beauty, it would be difficult to excel any Our southern tour on the whole was where. a very delightful one, and we were glad of the privilege of making it, and be oming better acquainted with the religious, material and social conditions of the South, and with many friends in that section.

Miss Helen Gould wrote a leter recently in answer to a request for a statement of her opinions in regard to the use of wealth. It was not necessary, for everybody knows her ideas of the use of wealth. It is not remarkable as a piece of literature, but it is made eloquent by her deeds wherein she has carried out the Christian idea of stewardship. It is worth noting that a woman with millions recognizes that the gift of loving sympathy is of more value than the gift of money, and that she herself gives both. She says in part:

"The Christian idea that wealth is a stewardship or trust, and not to be used for one's personal pleasure alone, but for the welfare of others, certainly seems the noblest, and those who have more money or broader culture owe a debt to those who have had fewer opportunities. And there are so many ways one can help. Children, the sick and the aged especially have claims on our attention, and the forms of work for them are numerous-from kindergartens, day nurseries and industrial schools to 'homes' and hospitals. Our institutions for higher education require gifts in order to do their best work, for the tuition fees do not cover the expense of the advantages offered, and certainly such societies as those in our churches and the Young Woman's Christian Association and the Young Men's Christian Association deserve our hearty co-operation. The earnest workers who so nobly and lovingly give their lives to pro-mote the welfare of others give far more than though they had simply made gifts of money, so those who cannot afford to give largely need not feel discouraged on that account. After all, sympathy and good will may be a greater force than wealth, and we can all extend to others a kindly feeling and courteous consideration that would make life sweeter and better.'

THE STORY OF JARED.

[From "Fortune's Boats." By Barbara Yechton.
Reprinted by permission of and by special arrangement with the publishers, Houghton, Mifflin & Company.

The following stry of how a good man trusted a bad man and how the bad man, through being trusted, came to be worthy of it, is one of the strongest pieces of fict on that has issued from the press this year. Uncle Gabriel is a little clergyman living in New York without a parish because whenever he was offered one he resigned it in favor of some one whom he thought needed it more, earning a scanty subsistence by the exercise of his unusual knowle go of languages editing an Italian paper and using most of his time and money for the benefit of his friends, the immigrants Jared was a ruffian and an ex-convict whom Uncle Gabriel tried to save by getting him out of his evil associations. He had secured a position for him is Deaver and provided the means for his transportation thither Jared is ready to start and calls on the minister on his way to the station.

It happened that uncle Gabriel was quite alone when Jared Watkins called. At the flat-topped desk in the dining room he sat writing by the fast fading light of a late April afternoon. The article was for the next number of the Italian paper, the subject Garibaldi,—a hero dear to the little man's heart,—and his pen was traveling over the pages of his pad with genuine enjoyment. Yet he heard and recognized the stealthy knock at the front door, and immediately rose to answer it.

"Ah, good-evening, Jared! Glad to see you!" he said heartily. "Come in, my friend, walk right in! I'll take you to my room to have our talk. It's pretty small—shouldn't wonder if we too big men'd be rather crowded. Ha! ha! But we'll manage somehow. Tell you what, you can sit on the bed, and I'll hang my feet out of the window. That'll give more space—eh? Ha! ha! This way, Jared!"

Mr. Kincaid took the lead, turning up the light for the visior to see his way across the drawing room. It was Jared's first admittance wi hin the flat, and he followed his patron leisurely, as he went casting, from under beetling brows, glances sly but sharp to right and left; glances which, by the time he reached Uncle Gabriel's bedroom, had fixed in the protege's mind the exact location of the few articles of value in the little parlor.

"Take a seat, Jared; this chair's about the only one here that would bear such a heavy weight as you. Light weights may not be imposing, perhaps, but I've found one advantage they possess,"—the little man's eyes were twinkling behind his glasses, he was in good spirits this evening. -"they agree better with old, infirm furniture than do you heavy people. Ba! hal This wouldn't hold you-I'm perfectly safe in it," as he spoke, twisting 'round a weakbacked revolving chair, which had lost its thread and wobbled aimlessly from side to side. Mr. Kincaid confidently seated himself in it. "Little place, but cosey-isn't it?" he asked. A comprehensive wave of the hand indicated his small domain.

Having settled his huge bulk to his satisfaction, and placed on the floor beside his chair a dirty looking carpet-bag which he had carried, Jared was now letting his shrevd eyes wander around his friend's bedroom. It was cosey, in its arrangement showing evidence of a woman's touch and thought, but, save for the fine copy of Andrea del Sarto's head of Christ which hung upon the wall, and for Mr. Kincaid's new spring overcoat which lay over the foot-rail of the bed, everything in the apartment was of the simplest, and indeed shabby. The picture had been presented to uncle Gabriel years ago; the overcoat had come in rather an unusual way-in payment of a piece of writing from a clothier who was short of ready cash. From the same source and on the same terms had come the new suit of clothes in which the protege was now arraved.

Jared appraised the furnishings at a very low figure, but the comfort which they represented appealed directly to him and embittered his soul.

"You're fine an' comfortable. What more d's a man want'n something to eat an' drink an' a place to sleep?" he said; he had a rough, abrupt manner. His tone grew querulous. "This'd be a palice—a palice—to me!" he declared. "You'd ought to see where I slep' las' night!—a shelf 'gainst the wall, an' two of us on it at that. Guess there was more'n two—" this grimly, and with a reminiscent scratch of his upper arm.

"Why, how's that? I gave you—er—I told you to get sleeping accommodation at the Mills Building," Mr. Kincaid exclaimed, in surprise.

Jared started, and hastened to retrieve his mistake. "You did gi' me some money, parson; you're the best-and-only-friend -I've got-in the world!" he asserted, with a sidelong, emphatic movement of his brawny hand. "You've been a friend to me when everybody else'd turned the cold shoulder. You did gi' me money yesterday for a Mills bed, an' it was my intention to've gone there, but, parson, I ain't an angel, an' I ain't dead, consequently I had to eat. An' by the time I'd satisfied myself an"-here he dropped his voice and tried to look modest, with a shrewd eye on his audience, -"'ad give a bite to a poor wretch as bad off as myself, there weren't much left; not more'n enough to get a shelf in one of them sleepin'-hells along the riverside. your fault, parson,-it's all mine. I'd no business to be givin' a meal to that man with the money you gi' me for another purpose. Oh, I know it-I know it," waving his hands at the distressed little clergyman, who was trying vainly to interrupt his protege's flow of words. "But I've got a heart, parson-a heart, sir-if I am a bad lot, an' I'd 've slep' on that shelf every night in the week rather'n refuse a meal to that unfortunate creature." He paused, with an air of being overcome by his feel-

"Why, certainly, Jared, certainly!" exclaimed Mr. Kincaid eagerly. He put out his thin hand and patted the other man's broad shoulder. "My friend, I would never be the one to blame you for such an unselfish piece of kindness," he said. "I've always felt that you had a good heart, Jared. And there'll be no more sleeping on a shelf against the wall for you-let us thank a merciful Heavenly Father for that, Jared! No more being hungry, with an empty pocket, and without a home. This opening in Denver is full of promise-fu-l-l of promise! There you'll be able to put the old unhappy past entirely behind you-bury it, in fact, and with God's help make a new name for yourself, a new and honorable name, my friend. It's an excellent opening in Denver, and I know you'll make good use of it, Jared. I expect great things of you in this new situation -great things! Don't you forget that." Uncle Gabriel's bright face beamed with kindness, his voice rang hopefully.

But the little red eyes under Jared's sullen brows were filled with an ugly light. "'A new life!" he cried out roughly, almost fiercely. "I tell you, there ain't no new life for me. I've gone wrong -I'm a jail-bird-an' that settles it! Down in the gutter I'm to stay-where I belong. Don't say a word, parson. That's just the way it stands. There's no gettin' up in the world again for me-God won' help me, an' man won' let me." Jared was in downright earnest now. "I tell you that's true!" He brought his fist down on the little table near him with an unexpected bang that made Mr. Kincaid jump. "Anderson said he'd gi' me-I mean len' me half the money to get to Denver. To night I went to him for it, all ready to start," motioning to the carpet-bag beside him, "as the train goes at midnight I went to him for the money he'd promisedwhat's he tell me? He ain't got no money to lend-he can't spare it! That's all. Yes, sir,-says he-can't do it! Lyin' cheat! Interested in me? Bah! I tell you, parson, he don' care a-

"Jared! Jared!—no swearing!" broke in Mr. Kincaid firmly, barely in time to arrest the oath that trembled on his protege's lips.

Jared glared, then dropped his head; a little whine came into his voice. "I ask your pardon, sir—hope you'll forgive me. It's the bad company I used to keep that's learned me them ways. But I'm tryin to do different—since I've known you. 'Tain't easy, but I'm tryin'; you're my best friend, parson; you won' be hard on a poor feller?"

"I do believe that you're striving to be a better man, that you've turned from the evil ways and are seeking after God. Yes, Jared, I believe that," Mr. Kincaid said kindly, instantly mollified. "And I'll never be hard upon you, my friend, never, of that you may be sure. For I know by my own experience that even with the strongest resolution, it is often far from easy to overcome the old Adam within us." The near-sighted, unsuspicious little gentleman failed to notice the expression, half amusement, half contemptuous, that contorted Jared's mouth at his remark, and to conceal which he coughed behind his hand.

"And now I'll tell you something pleasant," uncle Gabriel continued gayly—"something very pleasant! It's a pity Anderson has dropped out; but it's his loss as much as yours, Jared, for it is a great privilege to be able to help a fellow creature to stand once more upon his own feet. A man who knew what he was talking about says that 'Liberty is that place in life in which we can do our best.' This place in Denver is going to be liberty to you, Jared, for you will be free to do your best in it,-free from the evil associates that sometimes tempt you here, and with your past a dead past, indeed. Those who meet you out there will know you only as you show yourself-an honest man, as I firmly believe you now to be, and deserving of respect. At your very best you will be out there with God's help-your best of body, mind and soul. See? Why, Jared, you may yet rise to be one of the firm. I expect it of you-nothing less! Ha! ha!"

Pulling open the top drawer of his chiffonier-it was never locked-Mr. Kincaid took out a pocket-book. Its once smooth surface was scratched and worn with the service of years, its form limp and flat, and from among its musty folds Jared's patron drew a roll of bills. By the provision of a friend-long dead-uncle Gabriel, twice a year, received a small sum of money. Its expenditure should have added to his personal comfort and lightened the pecuniary cares which sometimes pressed heavily upon him; but it was mainly spent in giving aid to the suffering poor that came to him for help. Now, separating one bill (it was all the cash that he expected to own for weeks to come) from the roll, the little gentleman laid it away in the pocket-book, then turned to Jared with a happy countenance.

"From a chance remark of Anderson's yesterday, I feared that he might back out at the last moment," Uncle Gabriel said. "So I prepared for such an emergency-I was determined you should have this chance, Jared! On my way up town this afternoon I called upon a man I know and made an arrangement with him to do some work. He's been after me for some time to take it, but it's work on a dictionary and-ehrather confining, with my other indoor labors-editing those papers, I mean,-so I'd fought rather shy of the job. My friend agreed at once, and I got him to advance me some money on my future work. That is in here," he motioned to the roll of bills, "as well as a small amount which comes to me semi-annually. Altogether there's enough to take you to Denver, Jared, and to allow you a little over for meals on the cars, and for a bite when you get to your journey's end. As you say, not being an angel or dead, you must eat. Ha! ha! pretty good for you, Jared! Now, see," Mr. Kincaid began counting the money out on the little table near which sat his protege.

"It was my intention to go to the station with you," he continued, shedding the bills from his fingers with the slow, awkward touch of one unaccustomed to such handling. "But your train goes at mideight, and I've an article to finish for my Italian paper and some proofs to correct, dictionary proofs—I began work right away—that must be given in to morrow morning, and it'll take—well—most of the night to get it all finished. Else I certainly would go up with you."

At sight of the money a hard, glittering light had sprung into Jared's ferret eyes, a greed that set his heavy mouth twitching. The big fingers spread upon his knees worked with longing, and, before uncle Gabriel had well finished his count, they were outstretched and had closed hungrily upon the bills. "God bless you, parson!" he exclaimed breathlessly. He brought the two fistfuls of money together and held them extended before his almost incredulous eyes. "I ain't seen so much for years-years-years!" he said thickly. With trembling fingers he shook the bill; into an even pile and laid them lovingly away in a dilapidated wallet which he produced from some remote pocket. Then he lifted his huge figure erect and faced his patron. "There's nobody been so good to me since I was born as you've been," he declared, with an unusual and genuine earnestness in his voice. "I ain't had any too much of such treatment; mostly it's been kicks an' cuffs an' hard words. If I'd met you years ago, maybe I'd been a better man! Parson, you're the right sort, you are! God bless you!" He wrung uncle Gabriel's hand, ard the little man patted him on the arm with the other hand.

"If you could know the great pleasure it gives me to do this for you, Jared!" he said, beaming affectionately upon his protege. "All I ask is that you keep straight and make a new, honest name for yourself in Denver. That's all I ask. And, perhaps, out there, one of these days, you'll have opportunity to pass along to others in trouble some of what you call my 'kindness' to you-asking them to pass it on to some one else. Eh, friend? In that way one can d, a good deal of bookkeeping without having a very long pocket. Wasn't it Benjamin Franklin said something like that? Wise old Ben! I am sorry I can't go to the station with you, Jared; I'd like so much to've seen you off. Let me see-I wonder if I could?" he finished, with a questioning glance at the table where lav a bundle of proofs waiting to be revised.

Jared scowled heavily. 'Is it 'cause you don' trust me, parson, that you'd be goin' along?" he asked, in an injured, sulky tone. "You've got your writin' to do, an' the Lord knows—g odness knows," he hastily corrected himself at Mr. Kincaid's upraised finger—"goodness knows I've been bother enough to you without you takin' the time—vallyble time—to go all the way to the train with me. "Tain' necessary; you don' think I'd spend that money on anything but the tickets—"

"Why, Jared!" broke in Mr. Kincaid, deeply pained to have in any way, however unintentionally, hurt his protege's feelings. "Why, my friend, whatever in the world put that absurd notion into your head? Don't you know that I trust you? Well, I do. I trust you, Jared, I trust you thoroughly! There! Now sit down and we'll chat a little longer before you go. You know we shan't have the opportunity again in a hurry. Eh? Sit down."

But Jared did not sit down during his pairon's absence. He continued to stand, and his eyes were fixed, with a horrible fas cination, upon the open chiffonier drawer, where on a heap of disarranged collars, cuffs and handkerchiefs lay uncle Garbriel's old pocket book, in full view. The man's hand went out, the fingers working, clutching at the empty air, then fell to his side, and turning his back he stared unseeingly down upon the table.

Suddenly Jared wheeled around, made a stride to the drawer, snatched out from the pocket-book the bill Mr. Kincaid had left there, and stooping, shoved it inside his shoe-the new shoes that uncle Gabriel had given him. "He hadn't ought to left me alone, alone-me-a jail-bird!" he muttered fiercely. His breath grew short, a wild excitement came into his manner. "It's mos' too easy!" he declared, with a nervous contortion of the mouth that was intended for a smile. Seizing the overcoat that lay over the foot-rail, with a few rapid sweeps of his hand it was folded and deposited in the carpet bag. Darting into the drawing-room he swooped down upon a valuable little bronze match-box which Miss Austin had given Margaret, and in a trice that also was stowed away in the same receptacle. The whole thing was done with marv-lous dexterity and quickness, and when Mr. Kincaid re-entered the room, Jared received him with the stolid composure which was that gentleman's habitual experience of him.

"Here it is," uncle Gabriel remarked, handing the letter of introduction to his protege. "Put it in a safe place, Jared, and deliver it just as soon as you arrive in Denver-before you even get a meal. Mr. Maynard is a good man, an excellent good man! and a faithful friend of mine. He'll be a friend to you, too, Jared. You must go? I suppose you're right to get on board the train early and have a good night's rest. Well, friend," the little man's voice grew very gentle and affectionate, "we've known each other for a considerable length of time; now our paths are diverging, and we may never meet again-let us pray before we part."

Jared's face darkened, he made an involuntary movement toward the door; but the hand upon his arm drew him back. The two men knelt down beside the narrow white bed, side by side, and with one hand resting upon Jared's clinched fist uncle Gebriel prayed—"O God, thou knowest us to be set in the midst of so many and great dangers that by reason of the frailty of our nature we cannot always stand upright; grant to us such strength and protection as may support us in all dangers, and carry us through all temptations; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!"

Then they rose up, and Mr. Kincaid led his friend out into the public hall, and there they parted. "Good-bye, Jared! God's blessing be with you!" was uncle Gabriel's benediction.

Jared looked up at the bright, kindly face smiling down at him over the banisters, at the brown, near-sighted eyes across which lay an undeniable moisture, and a curious sound escaped his lips. It was intended for "Goodbye," but was really a cross between a grunt and a groan.

"Poor fellow! He feels the parting!" thought the little clergyman with gratification—the protege was not given to emotion—and he went back to his room and began his work of correcting the dictionary proofs—arduous work, of a kind he particularly disliked, and which he had yet cheerfully undertaken for Jared's sake.

Ponderously, with lagging feet, went Jared down the stairs he had so often trod. Never again would he go up them, he told himself; at the very moment he turned suddenly and retraced a step or two, then hurriedly and impatiently resumed his downward way. At the door of the house he again paused, with his hand on the knob. swayed by two strong emotions; the expression of his face frightened a little child who ran past him. "He trusted me!" "He hadn' ought to 've lef' me there-he knew I was a jail-bird!" Good and evil fought within the man's breast-and presently, with an awful oath, he opened the door and, striding out into the sweet April night, was lost in the darkness.

Evil had triumphed.

Uncle Gabriel came home late the next evening. The dictionary had held his attention for the greater part of the day, so that he had found quite a company of poor Italians waiting for him at the river office when he finally reached there. He had listened to their tales of woe, no less volubly told for the delay; had counseled, comforted, and calmed what Frances saucily designated as his "constituents," settling disputes, encouraging the timid, and in general straightening out difficulties. He had gone to a restaurant and ordered a cheap dinner, and then given it. untouched, to a poor, hungry creature who eyed him wolfishly from the door. Without a cent in his pocket, the little man had walked up town, and now had reached home, tired, empty, and weighed down by an unusual and unaccountable depression that was hardest of all to bear.

Frances ran down a couple of the long flights of stairs to meet Mr. Kincaid. "Dear, blessed old boy! He looks dreffle tired!" she declared; standing a step or two above her uncle, she turned his face up between her hands, and kissed him. "Didn't have a thing to eat, not even from a lunch wagon, did him? I thought not! You're bad-yes, you arebad!-not to take better care of yourself when you know we all love you. Never mind," she snuggled her piquante little face against uncle Gabe's for a moment, in token of forgiveness, "come on upstairs with me. I had a feeling that you'd come home all tired out, and I've just cooked you a little supper-all by my own self. It's waiting for you—a nice cup of beef tea—just as you like it-and a chop-brown and juicy, done to a turn. Doesn't the mere hearing of it make your mouth water? And you'll eat it right away, won't you?"

"Why, of course, I'll eat it right away—never you fear!" laughed uncle Gabriel. "I'm as hungry as a hunter. Take care, or I'll gobble you up, as a relish. Ha! ha!" They were going up the steps together, his arm around Frances's waist. "Any letters for me? Anything from Jared?" he asked. "He said he'd post a line in time for me to receive it by the last delivery this evening."

"He's back—here—waiting for you. And he looks dreadfully!" Frances whispered, relieved to have accomplished her errand. "Mother sent me to tell you."

Mr. Kincaid started violently. "What! Jared back? What're you saying?" he cried in consternation. Dashing up the steps he reached the public hall, and came face to face with his protege. "You here, Jared! What does this mean?" demanded uncle Gabriel, surprise and agitation giving an unusual peremptoriness to his tone.

Jared hastily put out an appealing hand; his other hand held the carpet-bag which he had carried the night before. "Parson, let's go where I can talk to you," he begged hoarsely, and one glance at his drawn, sodden face, his desperate eyes and fierce mouth, completely routed Mr. Kincaid's short lived anger.

"Certainly, certainly," he agreed. "Come to my room. Frances, run and open the other door for me. Eat?" His hunger forgotten, he looked blank at his niece's reminder. "Oh!—yes, by and by, by and by, my dear. I couldn't now. Come, Jared."

When the two men were in Mr. Kincaid's little room and the portiere drawn, Jared sat down heavily in the chair which his patron silently pushed toward him, and opening the carpet-bag, drew out of its depths the overcoat which he had packed into it the night before. With this in one hand and the bronze match-box in the other, he looked up at his friend. "I stole these las' night," he said, dully, doggedly. "Stole 'em from you while you were out of the room gettin' the letter of introduction. What you goin' to do 'bout it?"

Uncle Gabriel threw a hasty glance at the closet within which he had supposed his coat hung; bewilderment, incredulity, deep pain, appeared in rapid succession on his expressive face.

"An' I stole the ten dollars out of the pocket-book in the drawer," went on Jared, in the same dull monotone. "What you goin' to do 'bout it?"

With shaking finger: Mr. Kincaid opened the drawer, opened the pocket-book, and hunted through every compartment. It was empty. He turned and faced the thief. "And I trusted you!" he said sadly, brokenly. Sitting down on the bed, he put one hand before his eyes; his lips were moving, but no sound came from them.

Leaning forward in his chair, Jared watched uncle Gabriel intently; and presently it entered into his dull mind to comprehend what his friend's quiet meant. "He's prayin' for me!" he thought, with a heavy start, his sodden face turning a dark red. And then the strange power which had held and tormented him throughout the last twenty four hours, and finally brought him again to his long-suffering friend, now forced him to full confession.

"Yes, you trusted me!" he broke out, when he could no longer bear the silence. "You're the only person what's trusted me, the only

An' you hadn' ought to done it. You knew what I'd been; you shouldn' 've trusted me one minute alone with anything that could be stole. I ain't like you; I ain't one of the good kind, though I've pretended it many a time to blind you. I'm a bad eggbad as ever they come—an' you might's well know it all. I didn't mean to go to no Denver." He saw Mr. Kincaid's violent start, but went doggedly on with his story, pausing now and then between the sentences. "I meant to get all the money I could out of you, then scoot with it-go on a tremendous spree—an' never lay eyes on you again. . . . When you lef' me alone I took all I could. I'd 've got more, if you badn' come back so quick. . . . I intended to pawn the thing's soon's I went out, but, somehow, I didn't, I kep' putting it off. But I spent a good pile of the money, besides the ten I took out the purse; that went first, an' what you gi' me for meals on the cars," the peculiar contortion that did Jared service for a smile flashed across his ugly mouth and was gone. "I e't an' I drank my fill-for once! I went to the theyater-I made a night of it-a terrible night! An' maybe you think I had a tearin' good time!"

Jared rose from his chair-gripping the foot-rail of the bed with one brawny hand on which the big veins stood out, he waved the other at Mr. Kincaid, his heavy face worked convulsively, his voice grew thick and agitated. "Talk about your hell punishment," he cried, "there can't be no worse hell than I carried roun' with me last night an' to-day. I've done worse things in my life than steal from a parson, but I've never had so much torment here to contend with," touching his breast. "I tried to get away from it-I ain't used to bein' chicken-hearted-but I couldn'-I couldn'! That's why I come back. I didn' want to come, but I had to. I never thought that all you'd done for me, every kind word you'd spoke, every prayer you'd prayed with me, every cent you'd took from yourself to give me would've rose up an' tormented me like it done." The sorrowful gaze of his friend was more than Jared could bear; hastily he turned his own eyes away. "I couldn' eat enough, I couldn' drink enough, no matter how much I poured down, to forget you! I couldn' pawn your overcoat, I couldn' spend the rest of the money. Here"-he threw the bronze match-box upon the bed and uncle Gabriel's overcoat af er it. Then, slowly, reluctantly-only God could know at what struggle-he laid beside them all that was 1-ft of the roll of bills, his friend's gift of the night before. "That's the best I can do," he said gruffly. "Now, I'll be off. You won't want no such devil's spawn's I am round you again." Picking up the carpetbag, he pushed aside the portiere to go out, but Mr. Kincaid's hand arrested him.

A kindness that was divine shown in the little gentleman's eyes, and sounded in his voice. "You are the child, not of the devil, but of God, Jared, sinful and erring; but always the child of God! Don't you ever forget that! He would never refuse forgiveness to one of his penitent children; and how should I dare deny you the forgiveness that I ask of h m for myself every day. I forgive you, Jared, for I believe you to be truly sorry for what you've done."

"Sorry?" cried Jared vehemently; his heavy under lip shook. "Parson, I've never been so sorry for anything I done in all my life! You might know—when I come back!" His gesture toward the articles on the bed spoke volumes.

"Suppose that matter could be arranged—just suppose it were possible—would you go to Denver and try to make a better name for yourself?" Mr. Kincaid asked slowly.

Jared made an impatient movement. "No sense bringin' that up, parson. I've had my chance an' lost it," he answered roughly. "We won' say any more 'bout that."

"Yes, but we will," gently persisted uncle Gabriel. "I have no more money of my own—not a cent; but, perhaps, perhaps, I could borrow enough to—er—make up what is missing. So that you might still go out and fill the situation."

The projege's jaw dropped, he made a step forward. "What! you'd do this for me, after what I done?" he cried out incredulously.

Uncle Gabriel nodded; tears were in his eyes. "You've been an under dog all your life; now I want you to have the chance to be something better," he said.

"Good Lord!" ejaculated Jared. Dropping into a chair, he laid his arms on Mr. Kincaid's table and buried his face in them; several heavy sobs shook his big frame.

"If I do this, can I trust you to make honest use of the opportunity?" asked uncle Gabriel presently.

Jared lifted his face. All his stolid composure was gone; his eyes were wet and the heavy lips and chin worked with e notion.

"Ay, parson, you can!" he cried hoarsely, striking his hand on the table to lend | emphasis to the words. "I'll force myself to be trusted! I'd be worse'n a brute beast, if I didn' make you some returns for all 'you've done for me! Gi' me this one chance more, an' le' me show you what I can do. I'll pay you the money I stole, I will-I will! I'll pay you back every cent, an' I'll try-hard er'n I ever tried before-to be honest. Only," his hands went out imploringly,-"only don' let 'em put me where I'll handle money; there's a devil in here as well's a heart!' motioning to his breast. "Keep money out of my way, an' I swear," he lifted one big, brawny, shaking hand,—"I swear to you, not by God, parson-I've broke too many promises of that sort-but by the memory of the only creature in the world that I never ill-treated, never wronged-by the memory of my li'l baby girl that died years ago." Two big tears ran down Jared's face. "She loved me, that h'l thing, an' I never laid a rough finger on her. I'd a' gi'n my life to save hers, but she had to go. Annie is the best I know, parson, an' I swear to you by her that I'll try to live honest if I ever get to Denver. You can ask your God to help me, parson"-

"My God, and your God, too, Jared," came in the little gentleman's earnest, hopeful

"Have courage, my friend; and have faith in His mercy. The Christ who, in the mi!st of His own agony, yet heard and pardoned the penitent thief, will never turn from you. And, if it be allowed in the other world, don't you think your little Annie is pleading for you? Come, friend, let us lift our hearts to Him." Kneeling down beside Jared, with an arm thrown across the man's bowed shoulders, uncle Gabriel poured out his soul in prayer. And the deep fervor, the simple speech, and childlike, absolute faith in the mercy and love of God, in the human sympathy of Christ, brought a light into the soul of the poor sinner in whose behalf the prayer was offered.

The noon train which left the city the next day for the West bore with it Jared Watkins, taking with him uncle Gabriel's blessing, an unfamiliar sense of respectability, and in his heart a new hope which, with God's help, would bear fruit in the future.

SOME MODERN OCCULT FADS-II.

W. E. HARLOW.

In our first article we endeavored to establish the fact that certain mental states produced physical changes. Who is it that has not heard or known of persons dropping dead upon receiving the sudden information that some friend was dead? Many a person's hair has turned white in a day who received a scare. If a man believes himself to have swallowed a fly, it is almost sure to produce vomiting, whether he did or not. If then, the mind is capable of producing an abnormal physical condition, why is it not capable under favorable conditions of producing a normal physical condition, since all laws follow the lines of least resistance? Let it be understood that the healing medium for all diseases is already in man. That medium is the blood. It is in the circulation of the blood that every wound is healed, and the rapidity with which the healing takes place depends upon the amount and quality of the blood supply to the affected part. The quantity and quality of the blood depends upon the air taken into the lungs and the food digested and assimilated by the sto mach and bo wels. The digestion and assimilation of food may be completely stopped by certain mental states. The mental states which most frequently interfere with nutrition are melancholia, worry, grief, anxiety, fear, unhappiness, love, etc. The world for centuries has gone to the extreme in materialism and physical science and has come to look upon man as possessing nothing that cannot be weighed in the balances or carved with a scalpel, and these occult fads will do a good thing if they force us to a re study of metaphysics and of man. I am prepared to admit almost all of their phenomena, but not the vagaries and false philosophies by which they claim to produce them. I will not indulge in knocking the crutches from under a cripple unless I can give him a better pair, and these I believe I have found, and their name is suggestive therapeutics. Suggestion, in its application to the cure of diseases, means the presentation of such thoughts or ideas to the mind as will result in physical changes. Suggestion has been scientifically applied in France for forty years, and is now being introduced in our medical colleges of America.

It is, however, only within the last decade that we have been given an hypothesis sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all psychic phenomena. This hypothesis was tentatively formulated by Thomas J. Hudson, of Washington, D. C., in 1892, and given to the world in two volumes known as The Law of Psychic Phenomena, and A Scientific Demonstration of a Future Life. His hypothesis in brief is as follows: Man is possessed of a dual mind. That is to say, man has, or appears to have, two minds, each endowed with separate and distinct attributes and powers; each capable, under certain conditions, of independent action. One is designated as the objective mind, and the other as the subjective mind. The objective mind is supposed to reside in the cerebrum. It is the mind with which we do business; the mind that comes, develops with, and finally dies with the physical body. It controls all voluntary motion. It reasons by all processes. The subjective mind is a separate and distinct entity. It may be said to occupy the whole human body, especially the cerebellum and spinal column. It controls all involuntary motion. As it is the subjective mind with which we have to do largely in the production of all mental phenomena, I will here give its principal normal functions, and the reader who has not read Mr. Hudson's works will have to take my statement for the proof of their existence. I have put most of them to the test in practical experiment and am fully persuaded of their correctness:

- 1. The subjective mind is constantly amenable to control by the power of suggestion.
- 2. It is incapable of inductive reasoning, can reason only by deduction.
 - 3. It has practically a perfect memory.
- 4. It is the seat of the emotions. Under this head we find four minor functions, three of which may be said, to belong to all animal creation; they are instinctive emotions, as follows:
 - (a) Self preservation.
 - (b) Reproduction.
 - (c) Preservation of the offspring.
 - (d) Religious worship.

These are the only normal functions of the soul in its relation to the physical body.

- 5. The subjective mind possesses the power to move inanimate objects without physical contact; this will account for the phenomena of modern spiritism.
- 6. It has the power to communicate and receive intelligence otherwise than through the channels of the senses. It perceives by intuition.
- 7. Its activity and power are inversely proportionate to the vigor and healthfulness of the physical organism; that is, the nearer death we approach, the stronger and more active becomes the subjective mind.
- 8. It absolutely controls the functions, sensations and conditions of the body, when not opposed by the objective mind. All of the silent, involuntary and vegetative functions, nutrition, waste, all secretion and excretion, the heart and lungs, and all cell life, are positively under the complete control of the subjective mind. The subjective mind never sleeps. The faculty of measuring time is inherent in the subjective mind alone. It accepts without doubt or hesitation every suggestion made to it, no matter how absurd or incongruous, so long as the suggestion does not conflict with the settled convictions and principles of one's life. This can at any time be demonstrated by a simple hypnotic experiment. Now don't get scared, brethren, when we say that in our study of the new psychology we have been led through the misty maze of hypnotism. We are still accounted orthodox by competent judges. Hypnotism is simply the elevating of the subjective mind to where it will accept a suggestion, and the abeyance of the objective mind. No person will ever perform an act under hypnosis which is contrary to his moral principles. Asleep or awake, the moral standard remains the same. If it is a bad thing we ought to know how to meet and avoid it, and if it is a good thing we ought all to know how to apply it. I affirm that it is the latter.

Familiarize yourself with these functions of the mind, and in our next article we will apply them to some of the "fads," interspersed perhaps with some of our own experiments.

CHINESE MOTHER GOOSE RHYMES.

Pre-eminent among the season's output of children's books for young and old is this highly decorated volume of translations from the nursery rhymes of the far east. So similar are these jingles to those with which the infants of our own land and tongue are wont to be entertained in the hour before bed, that one is tempted to think that the process of translating must have well-nigh eliminated the distinctively Chinese element. But the author refers to some of the best known English and American scholars in China as his assistants in the work, and a letter from Wu Ting Fang, the Chinese Minister at Washington, testifies that it is a faithful representation of the original. The name of China nowadays at once suggests Boxers-and perhaps even the Chinese nursery has its ear-boxers. But this book is chiefly valuable as showing us more vividly than any general statements could do, that the same heart of motherhood beats beneath the curious clothes of the Chinese parent, and the same endearing qualities of playful and mischievous childhood prevail among the toddlers of that land, as here in our own midst. The grown folks of China are different from most of us. They think in a different way, they read different books and are amused by different things. But no such gulf separates the childhood of the east and the west. In reading these rhymes-and the translator, who is also illustrator, though a learned man of the University of Pekin, writes excellent jingles-we are occasionally struck by differences in expression especially in regard to things to eat and comparative terms of endearment; for example, when a fond mother says that her child is "sweeter than dates and cinnamon flowers," and when "boiled crow" and "mutton dumplings with vinegar and tea" are referred to as an appropriate diet for a yearling.

But after all there is much more room for surprise at their likeness to our own nursery rhymes than at their difference. Who will fail to recall that old familiar stand-by, "This little pig went to market," as he reads the following, or will fail to recognize in it the same motive to amuse the youngster by counting his own toes in the most primitive fashion:

This little cow eats grass,
This little cow eats hay,
This little cow drinks water,
This little cow runs away,
This little cow does nothing
But just lie down all day;
We'll whip her.

This one wherein the two-year-old is entertained by pleasing references to the parts of his head, and their several functions, is wondrously like a certain motion-song which is in more or less common use in infant classes and kindergarten:

> Little eyes see pretty things, Little nose smells what is sweet, Little ears hear pleasant sounds, Mouth likes luscious things to eas.

gestions of a truculent and peace-disturbing sort which do not appear entirely relevant to the theme as given in the first line, but which are not likely to be any less pleasing to the incipient Boxer on that account:

You take a tile, And I'll take a brick, And we'll hit the priest In the back of the neck.

This on the subject of crow as an article of diet may afford comfort to some American readers in view of the recent election:

Look at the white-breasted crows overhead! My father shot once, and ten crows tumbled dead. When boiled or when fried, they taste very good, But skin them, I tell you, there's no better food.

And finally, as one of many rhymes in which beasts and birds are made to express their opinion of existing social conditions and the probable outcome of the same for them, may be quoted the following which appears under the title, "What The Old Cow Said."

A sad old cow to herself once said,
While the north wind whistled through her shed:
"To head a drun they will take my skin.
And they'll file my bones for a big hairpin,
The scraps of bone they will make into dice,
And sell them off at a very low price;
My sinews they'll make into whips, I wot,
And my flesh they'll put in a big soup pot."

If one cares to consider the book seriously, it will be seen in an instant that it is, as Minister Wu himself says, "a valuable contribution to the folk-lore of nations." But most readers will find too much delight in reading it just for fun and in meditating upon the similarity of child nature in all ages and climes, to care very much about it as material for the scientific study of folk-lore.

THE READING OF FICTION.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

It is every one's duty, as well as a very great privilege, to acquaint himself with all the arts that are within his reach. It is quite as great a duty as to learn all one can of the sciences. Nay, it is even more need ful for those who would reach the springs of religious action to gain all that is possi ble of the beauty and poetry in the world. Some there are who insist that religion is very largely poetic in its nature, that Jesus was more poet than aught else, and that the highest beauty-the beauty of a perfected life-is the best religion. Be this as it may, it certainly is true that the arts, even more than the sciences, contribute to religious life. Music, therefore, and painting and poetry and architecture, it is the joyful duty of all religious people to study so far as they are able.

Among the newest of the arts, and at the same time one of the most accessible to all, is the art of fiction. Notall can hear the greatest orchestras and soloists, for these come only to the largest cities. Not all are in reach of the masterpieces of sculpture and painting. One must cross seas and travel roads to find them. Not all may be uplifted by gazing at the classics of architecture, for they are far removed from most of us. But there is none who cannot be admitted to the temples of poetry and fiction. They are in every village in the land. So easy of access, to-day, are the greatest masterpieces! We do not realize it. My aunt, a studious woman, when the novels of Dickens were appearing in the weekly papers, clipped the columns and stuck them on great squares of pasteboard for preservation. When the stories were all complete she had a roomfull of Dickens. A single novel occupied the space now given to an Encyclopedia Brittanica. Contrast with those laborious pioneer days of art the present ease with which one may possess himself of a set of any great novelist.

Moreover, the new art naturally has had to overcome considerable opposition. The Church—strangely enough, and yet not so strangely after all, for it has been her habit—opposed the newcomer. They were not true, these tales, therefore they were evil. How absurd do we now see this position to be! A great statue, it is not a real man, therefore it is a sin to look at it! A wonderful landscape, it is not real sky and water, therefore it is a waste of time to behold it! Step out-of-doors and look at real men and real skies. The reductio ad absurdum is complete.

We have long since learned that sculpture and painting may be truer to life than life itself; that the ideal is a more real thing than the actual; that nothing in all this world is more real than a great idea. We have learned, too, that fiction also is true. If truth is stranger than fiction, fiction is sometimes truer than fact. We have learned that there is much of truth and beauty in the world besides what is contained in demonstrable propositions, in statistical tables or in catechisms, prayerbooks and confessions of faith. A novel may be just as true as a treatise on biography, history or political economy; yes, it may be truer. Romola is truer than Gibbon's Rome. Whatever conveys to us pictures of life, clear conceptions of the human soul and its passions, whatever plants ideas in our minds, imparts truth and is, therefore, true. That class of mind which durability of its style. There are many minds to which it is an intense satisfaction to supply the details for which but a suggestion has been given. Indeed, it is always a pleasurable thing to apprehend a writer's or a speaker's meaning before he has fully expre-sed it. It is a tribute to one's own acumen. If the writer or speaker goes on without fully expressing the idea, he pays still another tribute to one's acumen. He sees one has grasped his meaning. And in this day when everything is done quickly such a style is particularly in keeping with the spirit of the age The question is, Will such work endure? Will the age that comes after be able so clearly to catch the drift? Will the lacunæ be so easily filled up? Or will not the detailed pictures of the older and more classic style, the leisure cannot distinguish truth from fact, and which always insists that nothing is true but fact, will miss many of the words of God which come to us from many sources. Such a mind can see no truth in Jonah, except it be a fact; no truth in Ruth, Esther or the stories of the Pentateuch unless they be history, facts, biographies. They are far truer than any history of the times could possibly be. They are so true as to be immortal

But in strictest sense the art of fiction is new. The world has always had its stories and story-tellers, its epics, songs, dramas; but prose fiction, sustained imaginative narrative, is a thing of a comparatively modern day. It is essentially the possession of our own end of the ages, and we take pride in it. No doubt it is but in its infaucy, and it is matter of great interest to watch the phases of its development.

For example, the current form of fiction, the condensed, suggestive narrative, that furnishes but a skeleton upon which the imagination is to put the flesh and clothing, presents a question to our minds as to the ly narratives with nothing to supply, live longer, as the perfect finish of a Raphael will outlast a charcoal sketch? Who knows?

Again, the war of tastes regarding romanticism and realism-to put it extremely-is another battle of the books of great interest. Shall fiction that is a portrayal of the actual-the fact, once more,-of life as it is, of what the author has seen and handled; or, at all events, shall the psychological novel which sets forth the phases of intellectual, emotional or religious life as the writer divines them-shall this prevail? Or shall the novel of the unusual. of adventure, of strange combinations of events; or, for that matter, the historical novel, having to do with wars and the vicissitudes of individuals involved in war. the struggle of the heroic, the endurance of the loyal-shall these prevail? It is hard to say. Some consider the latter taste evidence of immaturity, the boyhood of a writer or reader. Others say, "No, give us now and then an uplift from our work-aday world, a rest from the carking cares; let us move in the world of ideals." After all it is possible, is it not, to compromise such a question and to find books which combine the real psychological struggles for right against wrong, for higher life against lower, with the untoward circum tances of a romantic time or environment. And after all it wil be found, too, that the great, imperishable novels, those which stand as models of perfect construction, partake of both characteristics, leaning, if anything, rather strongly to the romantic side—Les Miserables, Romola, Henry Esmond, Lorna Doone.

New fiction, which comes fresh from the press, may be read with profit, certain literati to the contrary, notwithstanding. New books show us what the world is interested in, what it is thinking about. New books are like the deeds of men we know, they have the double interest of contemporaneousness. To be sure, it is quite possible to waste one's time as well as one's substance in riotous reading, and the great classics are not numerously increased by each generation; but it is worth one's while, through periodical fiction as well as through fiction in covers, to feel the pulse of one's own day ard find out what great thoughts are in people's minds.

Neverth-less, it is the great masterpieces that should most concern us. No man can read too many times such a book as The Mill on the Floss. To say, "I have read so and so," as if that were the end of it, is like saying, "I have thought that thought, seen that picture, heard that music, no need to again." We can walk for years with Jean Valjean and never grow tired of looking at him. Thanks be to the art that can so lift us out of ourselves and give us friends where friends are few!

SIX BEST BOOKS.

GEORGE H. COMBS.

"What are the six best books you have read this year?" This question, with the courteous invitation to answer through the columns of the Christian-Evangelist, came to the writer the other day.

The question is so broad, so vague. "Best books" Best for whom? Best for what?

Best when? That which feeds one will not feed another. One palate relishes cauliflower, another abhors it. The book best for the astronomer is not the best book for the psychologist. Tastes differ; needs differ. We cannot all be put on the same diet. You may like quinces; I don't. "The Best One Hundred Books" is a literary fake. The best interests of Mr. Smith may possibly be conserved by leavi :g these best books unopened. Let us be frank. Many of the standards the classize, do not suit our palates. The writer for example does not like Bunyan. When but a boy he felt it his duty to like him and tried, but with sorriest result. "The Pilgrim's Progress" seems dull, War" Holy even duller and, as for the sermons with their interminable divisions, there is even slighter relish. Yet "The Pilgrim's Progress" is unquestionably a classic. Others do not find it dull. The dullness was doub less in the reader. But is it not best frankly to recognize it?

The when is also important. There are doubtless times in the lives of all when a book of Riley's poems or the humor of Artemus Ward would be more helpful than Pascal's "Thoughts," or Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying." In reading as in working the mood counts.

All this and more should be stated in prefatory note. The "best six?" Well, to one given to a somewhat wide though not the closest reading, to whom so much has appealed, the exclusions are difficult. There are so many claimants, so much to be said, such innumerable pros and cons.

Can one never get to the point? In headlong, desperate plunge, here is one, "Wisdom and Destiny," by Maurice Maeterlinck. It is stiff reading. It is musical, but the music is to be thoughtfully listened to. For the skimmer and the seeker of easy reading it will have little charm. Yet it is thoughtprovoking and illumining.

The book is a search for happiness and its key note is submission. "If all who count themselves happy"-so runs the argument-"were to tell very simply what it was that brought happiness to them, the others would see that between sorrow and joy the difference is but as between a gladsome, enlightened acceptance of life and a hostile, gloomy submission." The springs of happiness are within and not in external conditions; be quiet. "To be happy is only to have freed one's soul from the unrest of seeking happiness." It is an uncomplaining acceptance of life. Here is a mystical gospel close akin to that of Madame Guyon and the gentle It is not heroic or energizing but Amiel. fits itself to our unheroic hours.

"Social Ideals in English Letters," by Vida M. Scudder, is another book well worth the reading. It is a worthy successor of "The Life of the Spirit in the Modern English Poets," by the same author, and this is high praise. The title of the book serves another purpose than the mere adornment of a cover. It is descriptive. It reveals the book. The Social Ideals of Carlyle, Ruskin, Dickens, Matthew Arnold, among many others, have here sympathetic and artistic exposition and interpretation. There is a "social problem." The author sees this and hers is luminous leadership. The book is more than an echo. It is a voice. "The Christian Conquest of Asia," by J hn Henry Barrows, is health. The book glows with the enthusiasm of faith. There were not wanting a few years ago those who held that Dr. Barrows' wide catholicity as exhibited in his conduct of "The World's Religious Parliament" at Chicago, where the representatives of every faith had freest utterance, leaned towards danger. thought was put into ugly print. This book comes as eloquent refutation. Dr. Barrows is not blind, nor is he narrow. He sees the good that may be in other religions, and unhesitatingly and cheerfully bears testimony to it as a gift of God. But he sees the weakness, too, of these religions and their powerlessness to help a sinful world, and this book is eloquent criticism and championship in one. From the most sympathetic expositors of other religions he shows their failures and limitations and above all faiths of the Orient he holds up the banner of the cross. Christ, not Buddha, is Asia's light,the light, too, of the whole world. And the Christ will win. Doors are opening, needs are crying, the day of victory dawns.

Of quite a different kind of literature is "The Wonderful Century," by Alfred Russell Wallace. The book is a review by an unquestioned authority of the century now well-nigh past. A sentence criticism would better give way to the contents: Part I.—Successes: Modes of Traveling; Labor-Saving Machinery; The Conveyance of Thought;

Fire and Light; New Applicatio s of Light -Photography; New Applications of Light -Spectrum Analysis; Theoretical Discoveries in Physics; Newer Applications of Physical Principles; The Importance of Dust; A Few of the Great Problems of Chemistry; Astronomy and Cosmic Theories; Geology; Evolution and Natural Selection; Popular Discoveries in Physiology; Estimate of Achievements:-the Nineteenth Century as Compared with Earlier Centuries. Part II.-Failures: The Neglect of Phrenology; The Opposition to Hypnotism and Psychical Research; Vaccination a Delusion; Militarism -the Curse of Civilization: The Demon of Greed: The Plander of the Earth. Such a bill of fare should whet any appetite. A fresh study of Coleridge and Emerson will serve as indications of numbers five and six.

B. B. TYLER'S LETTER.

The United States mails are tampered with! In my letter of November 15 I said: "I have recently read 'The Man of Galilee,' by Attigus G. Haygood." In this form the statement left my hand in Denver. Now, either in the Denver postoffice, or between Denver and St. Louis, or in the St. Louis post ffice, I was made to say: "I have recently read 'The Man of Galilee,' by Atticus G. Haggard." The name Haygood was changed to Haggard. The change could not have been made in the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Such a thought cannot be entertained for a moment. Neither the editor-in-chief, nor the office editor, nor the printer, nor the proof reader could have changed Haygood to Haggard, and all persons who have seen my chirography known that it is well-nigh perfect!

There is only one remaining explanation.

The United States mails are tampered with.

Let us elect a new president!

May I speak to you about two helpful books in Bible study? I have not seen a notice of either of them in any of our papers. They are not new books, but they are good—for the end in view.

The first of which I will speak is entitled, "A Harmony of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles," by William Day Crockett. Professor Willis J. Beech-r wrote the Introduction. Mr. Crockett is pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Canton, Pa.; Dr. Beecher is Professor of Hebrew in the Auburn

The book is from the press of Eaton & Mains, 150 Fifth Ave., New York.

This work is on the plan of the harmonies of the gospels with which you are familiar. If there are two or more statements of a fact, they are printed side by side. If there are apparent contradictions you have them before your eyes at the same time. There are no notes. No effort is made to remove difficulties. There are four accounts of David's death in the books of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles. There are two accounts of Solomon's sacrifice Gibeon, and two accounts of the young man's dream and prayer for wisdom. The prayer that Solomon offered at the dedica.

tion of the temple is reported in two places. There are four accounts of the chariots, horses, horsemen and commerce of King Solomon. There is a lack of harmony in these four accounts; but the statements in this book are placed side by side, while the student is left to work out an explanation, if possible, satisfactory to himself. Moreover, the He¹rew history, as far as we have it in the books named, is arranged in chronological order. I have used this "Harmony of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles" for three years and find pleasure in commending it.

The next book is entitled "How to Read the Prophets." The author is Buchannan Blake, B. D. The work is published by T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh. There are five volumes of about two hundred and fifty pages each. The regular retail price is, I believe, $1.50 a volume. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, handle the book in this country. Mr. Blake's effort is to the displace courses of rophets in their historic environment. As we are in the habit of studying the books of the New Testament. especially the epistles, so Mr. Blake would have us read the Hebrew Prophets. He attempts also to arrange the addresses of a given prophet in the order of their delivery, and to place the prophets themselves in chronological order. He places Jonah first; then Amos; then Hosea; then the prophet Oded; after this "the first burden" of Zechariah; following this comes the prophecy of Micah; later that of Nahum, then Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and "the second burden," of Zechariah, the prophecy of Obediah, and Joel's discourses.

These are in the first volume. The text is in the best style of the printer's art. There are also helpful and suggestive headlines. The history, as given in the Bible, is printed as a sort of introduction to the prophecy to be read. The history of the period to which a given prophet belongs, so far as seems to be necessary to an understanding of his prophecies, is also given in present-day English and up to the date of the latest discoveries in Bible lands and the conclusions of the ripest scholarship.

Mr. Blake does not claim to be inerrant, nor do I claim this for him. It is probable that you will dissent from some of his positions, but I have found, during the last two or three years, "How to Read the Prophets" very helpful. I now read the Old Testament prophecies with an intellectual and spiritual relish.

Dr. Josiah Strong's last book is his best. The reading of it made me fairly wild! I place the flag of my country just below the cross of my Lord; and I place the Declaration of Independence with the Constitution of the United States just below the Bible. There are three divine institutions—the family, the state, the church. This setting forth of my creed will help you to understand why I speak so enthusiastically about Dr. Strong's book entitled: "Expansion Under New World Conditions." The book is published by the

Baker & Taylor Co., New York. There are nine chapters, with the following headings: "Exhaustion of our Arable Public Lands;" "Our Manufacturing Supremacy;" "Foreign Markets a New Necessity;" "The New China;" "The New Isthmian Canal;" "The New Mediterran-an;" "The New Mediterranean an Anglo Saxon Sea;" "A New World Life" and "A New World Policy."

I will not attempt, in the brief space at my disposal, to condense the thought of this wonderful book. It is itself a condensation—as are all of Dr. Strong's books. Read this little volume of three hundred pages and be a larger and better American and a truer Christian.

I cannot for bear, in this place, to mention the latest book from the pen of Carro'l D. Wright entitled, "Outline of Practical Sociology." It is one of the volumes of the "American Citizen Series," published by Longmans, Green & Co., New York. It is a two-dollar book. Dr. Wright is, as you doubtless know, a pronounced optimist. His knowledge of social facts in the United States is probably larger than that of any other living man. His position as United State: Commissioner of Labor has given him unequaled opportunity to collect facts. The book to which I refer is full of statistics. A number of ingenious diagrams assist the reader in handling the great mass of facts which have been collected by this master statistician. This "Outline of Practical Sociology' is a veritable Book of Revelations. I cannot say more at present. As soon as I can find time to do so I will write at greater Denver, Col. length.

NEW BOOKS.

THE SKY PILOT; A Tale of the Foothills. By "Ralph Connor." BLACK ROCK; A Tale of the Selkirks. By "Ralph Connor." Both are illustrated by Louis Rhead. Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago. $1.25 each.

The success of these two books, which has brought their author into sudden fame in the literary world, is no more than their merit warrants. That over 100,000 copies of the two together have already been sold is no more than one would expect. They breathe the strong, free life of the west with all its glaring lights of heroism and noble achievement and its deep shadows of human wrath and folly. Having already fulfly reviewed both volumes in these columns, we need do no more here than call attention to the new and illustrated editions and register the conviction that their author, who is himself a "sky pilot" far up in the foothill country, never preached a better sermon than when he told for readers of the south and east these two stories of the great northwest.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF RICHARD YEA-AND NAY. By Maurice Hewlett. The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50.

Amo g the writers of to day, none has a style more inimitably his own and none has made for himself a distinctive place in the literary world, separate and apart, more surely than Maurice Hewlett. His "Forest Lovers" was a work of pure inspiration, of luminous imagination, of the most delicate and exact literary workmanship. His "Little Novels of Italy" pleased most readers less than the preceding. This latest volume excels the second, but will be to most readers less lovely than the first. But it is a masterly piece of historical fiction. Royal scandals have, time out of mind, been held to be legitimate matter for the historical novel. Perhaps because the common herd of hamanity finds it easier to conceive of a king (and e pecially a king long dead and gone) as > a real man with all the passions which animate untitled mortals, when he is pictured as loving, especially as loving where he ought not. And sothe author has done a real service by showing us the real man, living and breathing, fighting and loving and wining service from his enemies by the very kingliness of his nature, in spite of the contradictions of his character -the real Richard Yea-and-Nav where our sober histories of England have given us only a crowned and ermined dummy, a personification, as it were, of the highest virtues and deepest vices of chivalry, under the name of Richard the Llon heart.

> There is, of course, much fighting in a story which tells of Richard's rebellion against hisfather, Henry II. of England, of the crusade in which he fought his way to Jerusalem, fought the Saracen in Palestine and fought, more or less openly, his jealous allies all the [way there and all the way back, and of the wars which he waged against Philip Augustus of France on his return, and of his death on the field of battle. But, for all that, the book is far from being a chronicle of bloody deeds. To use his own comparison, the author differs from the poet of Mantua in singing the manmore than the arms. An excellent flavor of medievalism is preserved throughout the narrative and the author well understands and well portrays that chivalrous subtlety and fine feeling which underlay the often gross actions and fierce demeanor the of crusading knights. They were men of primitive passions and heroic vices But even Gilles de Gurdun, who hated Richard most cordially and justly on three separate counts and long sought his death by fair means or foul, could never kill the king even when he had him unarmed and in his power, because he felt Richard's kingliness and it overawed him. There is no known way of breaking the reader's partiality for Richard the Lion hearted, though he makes enemies of all the other characters in the book from time to time. Whether or not Mr. Hewlett has reached the high standard of perfection here which he touched in "The Forest Lovers," he has at least added !argel? to his reputation as a painter of character and a master of good English.

THE MASTER-CHRISTIAN By Marie Corelli Dodd, Mead & Co., New York. $1.50.

Miss Corelli's latest book has evoked so many conflicting opinions that it is scarcely worth while to add another. Indeed, there is scarcely another opinion to add, for all possible opinions, both favorable and unfavorable and in a'l degrees of intensity, have already been expressed. Whether or not she has written a great book, she has at least written a book which has in an eminent degree the quality of getting itself talked about. The theme is the hypocrisy and corruption of the church, especially the Roman Catholic Church, as exhibited in its workings in Paris and Rome. The villains in the piece are all Roman ecclesiastics and the role of hero is shared between a saintly old cardinal, who gets into trou le with the hierarchy on account of all those graces of character which commend him to the readers' favor, and a social reformer, who professes to be a sincere follower of Christ bus wars against the churches as monstrous misrepresentations of His spirit and teaching. As a polemic against spiritual wickedness in high places, it unquestionably expresses a large amount of truth. Still, all the author's eloquent denunciations of evil cannot prevent the impression that the wickedness and hypocrisy of the church, the Machiavel'ian intrigues of the papal cou t and the contrasting virtues of the pious cardinal and the lay reformer. appeal to her less as the elements of a moral aud religious problem than as material for a series of striking dramatic situations. And the situations are unquestionably there; strongly dramatic, though not infrequently overwrought and going far beyond the verge of melodrama.

Miss Corelli has never yet been able to confine the action of one of her novels to a single world. Like Alexander, she sighs for other worlds to conquer, and her first imagination can leap to other spheres more easily than his hoplites and phalanxes could transcend the limits of our narrow earth. In the Maeter-Christian she is daring enough to introduce a new incarnation of Christ in the form of a twelve-year-old boy, who follows the godly cardinal through exciting scenes in Paris and Rome, has an interview with Pope Leo XIII (for the story is contemporaneous enough to contain even a reference to the Dreyfus case) and finally vanishes when the cardinal dies.

That the book contains elements of strength, there can be no doubt. That its torrent of verbiage includes much real eloquence, is equally true. But its strong effects are for the most part produced by cruie means, and inaccuracies abound. The characters toss gold pieces to beggars and fling themselves into their saddles in the same old way that they do in all melodrama. And surely the public has a right to expect in the writer of a religious novel more accuracy than is involved when the author speaks of the apostles as "twelve fishermen."

THE BIOGRAPHY OF CHARLES H. SPURGEON. Compiled from his diary, letters and records by is wife and private secretary. Volume 4. Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago. Price $2.50.

This fourth volume closes the monumental work of which the earlier volumes have already been reviewed in these columns. It need only be said that the high standard which was set at the opening of the first volume was maintained to the close of the last. Mr. Spurgeon had filled so large a place in the religious life of England and in the affection of his contemporaries on both sides of the Atlantic, and he left behind him such a vast mass of biographical material, that the task of presenting his biography to the public as far as possible in his own words was one of importance and difficulty alike. The outcome shows that it could not have been committed to better hands. The volumes contain an immense number of letters and other documents relating to the life of the great preacher and they form a valuable contribution to the religious history of the nineteenth century.

CRITIQUE ON HIGHER CRITICISM. By Geo. T. Smith. Industrial Free Press, Winfield, Kan.

The volume in hand is not properly speaking a "cri: que on higher criticism," but a study of the Old Testament by the methods of the higher criticism. Like every writer on this subject, its author finds it necessary to take issue with the findings of other critics, and to that extent it is a critique. But the main force of the argument is devoted not to tearing down the work of this or that higher critic, much less the results of higher criticism in general, but to promoting an intelligent understanding of the different theories. The book is, in fact, much better than its name. Its definitions are liberal, its recognition of the legitimacy of critical methods is frank and explicit, and its spirit laudably free from bitterness and denunciation. On mooted questions, such as the authorship of the Pentateuch and the latter chapters of Isaiah, the arguments in support of both theories are stated dispassionately. The author's position is in the main conservative but, while opposing the analytical theory of the Pentateuch, he maintains that Isaiah 40-66 was written in Babylon during the exile.

THE EVANGELIZATION OF THE WORLD IN THIS GENERATION. By John R. Mott. Published by Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions. Price, $1.00.

Mr. Mott, who is general secretary of the World's Student Christian Federation, is eminently fitted to write such a book as this, because he has both information and enthusiasm and knows how to transmit both to his audience. The title of the book is a statement of its purpose. But what is meant by "evangelization" in any plan for evangelizing the world in a single generation? In the language of the author, "it means to give all men an adequate opportunity to know Jesus Christ as their Saviour and to become his real disciples, . . . to make the knowledge of the gospel accessible to all men." This limitation of the term ought to relieve the author of the accusation of proposing the accomplishment of the impossible. "It does not mean the conversion of the world with the generation," for even in Christian lands it is not possible to convert all men and we have no warrant for believing that all men will ever be obedient to the gospel. "It does not signify the Christianization of the world, if by that is meant the permeating of the world with Christian ideas and the dominance of the principles of Christian civilzation in all parts of the world," for history has shown that the institutions of civilization change only by slow growth. The author is not prophesving that the world will be evangelized within a generation, even in the limited sense of his definition, but he is saving that it is a possibility and an obligation. He recognizes that evangelization of this sort is not the end of the task. but that it must be followed by "the baptism of converts, by their organization into churches, by building them up in knowledge, faith and character and by training them for [service." A chapter is devoted to the difficulties which confront the church in the accomplishment of this task-first, difficulties in the world and second, difficulties in the church. The example of the progress of early Christianity and some modern missionary achievements are cited to show the practicability of the plan; and the resources of the Church in men, money, education, organization and means of communication indicate further that the task cught not to be considered impossible. There is much detailed missionary information in the book, including a bibliography of twenty-five pages, but its chief value is in its inspirational quality.

ELIJAH. By M. M. Davis, A. M., Author of "Queen Esther" and "Change of Heart." Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, 1900. Price $.75.

The author's little volume on "Queen Esther" having met with a generous reception from the public, the publishers secured him to write a similar volume on Elijab. This has just been issued from the press of the Company. It is a handsome, well-printed, well-bound volume of 201 pages. Elijah is one of the most picturesque and dramatic characters of the Bible and was altogether the most important figure of the period of Hebrew history in which he lived. Mr. Davis has succeeded in presenting a most vivid and life-like sketch of this remarkable man, and of the time in which he lived. It is, perhaps, one of the best of all the ways of studying the Bible, to take up its great characters biographically and become acquainted with the times in which they lived and the conditions of life with which they had to deal. It is also the most fascinating method of studying history, whether biblical or profane. The great events of Elijah's life are made to stand out like mountain peaks, and the lessons drawn from them are not only of a practical character, but very vital also in their bearing upon the problems of our own time. The readers of "Queen Esth-r" will be glad to welcome this additional volume from the same author and they will not be disappointed in their expectation of finding a most readable and instructive volume. The author has a happy faculty of seizing upon the essential features of the story, and of emphasizing their meaning by copious illustrations from literature. He is very happy also in the practical lessons which he succeeds in drawing from the various incidents in the life of this great Hebrew prophet and reformer. We bespeak for the work the same generous patronage which the former volume has received and is receiving from the reading public.

HOME AND SCHOOL CLASSICS. Published by D C. Heath & Company. Boston, $\leq 10$ and 15 cents each.

This series of classics, containing the best works of English literature for children of any age, is worthy of the highest commendation. The four numbers which are before us indicate sufficiently the character of the literature which it contains: "The King of the Golden River," by John Ruskin; "Goody Two Shoes," attributed to Oliver Goldsmith; "Jackanapes," by Mrs. Ewing; "The Tempest," by William Shakespeare. They are all admirably printed, well illustrated and carefully edited, with such notes as will be helpful but not tedious to the young. The numbers of the series are issued fortnightly at an annual subscription price of $2.50.

THE LAST REFUGE. By Henry B. Fuller. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. $1.50.

A vivacious story of 284 pages, located in Southern Italy. It is interesting, harmless, and has a moral. Theodore Egmont, Freiherr of Kaltenau, a man of middle age, leaves his ancestral home to descend into Italy in pursuit of happiness and a renewal of youthful spirits. After finding that society does not satisfy him, he starts on a tour through the country with an enthusiastic youth, Bruno de' Brunelli, for company. He soon finds that his interest in life is being renewed by devoting all his energies to helping Bruno find and win his lost love. It is an imaginative story which holds one's attention firmly to the end, where he feels that happiness is to be found in the devotion of one's life to others and that this world "is what we make it, what we UNKNOWN SWITZERLAND; Reminiscences of Travel.

By Victor Tissot. James Pott & Company,
New York. $3.

This sumptuous volume, with many photogravure illustrations and a large map, is an account of a roundabout journey through the mountains and valleys of Switzerland. The author not only sees the scenery and sees it well, but has an eye to his fellow-travelers, who always furnish half the fun on any journey, and recounts as he goes bits of Swiss history and larger bits of Swiss legend. His style in description is somewhat ornate and most readers will probably consider it marred by an excess of similes and metaphors. Take, for example, this paragraph of otherwise excellent description of the vicinity of the Lake of Zug: "Villages and hamlets, framed in orchards that surround them like great hedges, are scattered on the capes and promontories that rise above the shores covered with willows and ozierbeds; there are wide marshes dotted with motionless pools, in the midst of which great silvery water-lilles shine like the pale image of a dead star. A few islets covered with exuberant vegetation look like baskets of flowers floating on the lake."

The author, is one inclined to think, overestimates the traveling public's ignorance of this land which has been for centuries the playground of Europe, when he includes Lucerne, the Axen strasse and the Rhone Glacier under the head of "Unknown Switzerland," His route for the most part is not greatly different from that of most travelers. He goes through the St. Gotthard tunnel by rail, instead of tramping or wheeling or driving over the pass, and he goes over the Furka Pass, by the Rhone Glacier and down the valley of the Rhone, just as those vulgar, hurrying tourists go whom he so cordially and justly despises. Of the five parts into which the book is divided, only one treats of country which is really unknown tomost Swiss travelers, and even the Engadine comes far from being an untraveled valley in these days. And yet the title "Unknown Switzerland" is not wholly without justification, for the au hor, even on the beaten track, has eves to seethings which the others miss and has charming stories to tell which will tempt even the harrying tourist (who is making a circular tour from Paris through Holland, up the Rhine, across Switzerland and back to Paris in three weeks) to linger and listen.

THE VISION OF CHRIST. By the Rev. William Miller, author of "The Transfigured Valley." Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago. $.50

This is one of those handsomely bound and beautifully printed little volumes which this company is noted for bringing out on various phases of evangelical religion. It exhibits Christ as seen in humanity, in the New Testament, in history, in the church, in the poor and needy, in nature and providence, in all things that live, while the closing chapter indicates how we should live, "as seeing him who is invisible." The little book may be read through at a single sitting and can hardly fail to give one an exalted view of Christ, and a new conception of His immanence in all human life and in all visible things.

FORTUNE'S BOATS. By Barbara Yechton Houghton, Mifflin Company, Boston. Price $1.50.

This novel of New York life, from which the publishers have kindly permitted us to reprint a chapter, which will be found on other pages, scarcely stands in need of further review. It will be difficult for anyone to avoid reading through the story of Jared and having done that the reader will know that it is taken from a book strongly written and pervaded by a faith in humanity which always gives a healthful tone. The principal narrative has to do with five selfsupporting sisters who found novel methods of exercising their several talents for the benefit of the family exchequer. The character of uncle Gabriel is worthy to be compared on a small scale with that of the philanthropic and incomparable bishop in Les Miserables.

JUKES-EDWARDS. A Study in Education and Heredity. By A. E. Winship. Co., Harrisburg, Pa. $.50.

Students of criminology and of sociology in general are familiar with the family known as the "Jukes," which furnishes an unparalleled example of hereditary and congenital criminality intensified by environment and education. Of the twelve hundred persons of this family whose record has been traced, sixty were habitual thieves, one hundred and thirty were criminals, seven murderers, fifty, women who lived lives of notorious debauchery, three hundred died in infancy from lack of care and four hundred were physically wrecked at an early age by their own weakness. It is estimated that this family has cost the state of New York $1,250,000 in crime and pauperism. Dr. Winship states these and many other interesting facts in regard to this family, as collected by Mr. Dugdale several years ago, and contrasts with this record the family history of Jonathan Edwards and his descendants, a family which has been as notably productive of culture and talent as the other one has of crime. Of the fourteen hundred descendants of Jonathan Edwards, at least two hundred and eighty-five have been college graduates and among there are found thirteen college presidents (including presidents of Yale, Princeton, Union, Hamilton, Amherst, University of California, Columbia Law School and Andover Theological Seminary) and sixty-five college professors. The author's study of the life of Jona han Edwards is well worth while merely as a biography, but is doubly suggestive in this connection as a study of the workings of heredity and environment.

SQUIRRELS AND OTHER FUR BEARERS. By John Burroughs. With fifteen illustrations in color after Audubon, Houghton, Mifflin & Company. $1.00.

The fame of John Burroughs as a writer upon out of-door topics needs no reinforcement at this late date. He is a scientist whose writings give one the impression that his love for the living objects of his study is greater than his devotion to the lifeless abstraction of mere science. He is an observer whose eye is keen enough to note the foot-prints of the rabbit, the provident methods of the chipmunk, the domestic habits of the field mice, and yet he sees with his heart as well as with his eyes There is as much difference between the writing of John Burroughs and the ordinary cold book of science as there is between a passionate poem and a spelling book containing the same words. In this book the author introduces the reader intimately to the homes, haunts and habits of the squirrel, chipmank, woodchuck, rabbit, hare, muskrat, fox, weasel, mink, raccoon, poroupine, opossum and wild mice. It is a book which will be charming to any right-minded person between the ages of eight and eighty.

FOREGLEAMS IN NATURE OF REDEMPTION IN CHRIST, By B. W. Pierce, Christian Publishing Company.

We have here a new treatment of the problem of evil. The author denies that knowledge of evil is necessary to a knowledge of God and that suffering is a necessary step in man's elevation. E il and suffering, he says, come only through sin. There is found in nature a remedy for many of man's physical ills, and it is impossible to conceive, says the author, that if our knowledge were perfect we would not find there a remedy for all of them. By snalogy he reasons that there must be found in the spiritual realm a sufficient remedy for the ills to which man's soul is liable. The author lays much stress up in the denial of the doctrine of evolution. But his main argument, as we understand it, would not materially weaken even if that doctrine were true.

LIFE AND WORK OF DWIGHT L. MOODY. By Rev. A. W. Willisms. P. W. Zeigler & Co., Philadelphia and Chicago.

As one among many lives of Moody which have appeared since that great man's death, this is chiefly distinguished by the fact that it does not claim to be the only authorized biography. It is a well illustrated volume of more than 400 pages and tells the story of the great evangelist's life plainly and with many extracts from his sermons and speeches.

Consecration. A Message to the Church. By Evangelist M. B. Williams. Fleming H. Revell Co., Chicago.

As a call to the church to put away its sins and live a holy life, this message is well calculated to do good. Its definition of theological terms is hardly satisfactory. The author's idea of "regeneration" and "sanctification" as processes in which men are passive does not harmonize with many New Testament passages, but its emphasis on holy living is much needed.

DLD LANTERNS FOR PRESENT PATHS. By Francis E. Clark, D. D. Published by United Society of Christian Endeavor, Boston. Price, $.35.

This unpretentious booklet is the result of ome studies during "a long and lonely voyage on tropical sea"-studies which the author says vere undertaken rather for his own instruction and inspiration than with a view to giving them o the world. The spontaneity which marks the hought is perhaps accounted for by this circumtance. It is a little book of eleven devotional tudies from the prophecy of Jeremiah.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. Edited by James Hastings. Volume III. Kir-Pleaides. Charles Hastings. Volume III. Kir-Scribner's Sons. New York.

This third volume of the new Bible dictionary ontains many important articles, e.g., those on he language of the Old Testament and the lanruage of the New Testament; law; the Lord's Supper; Gospel of Luke; Gospel of Mark; Gospel f Matthew; Messiah; miracle; New Testament anon; Old Testament canon; Palestine; Paul; eter and the epistles of Peter. Further review f some of the contents of this very important olume will be given later.

Literary Notes.

The narrative of "The Siege of the Legations," written by Dr. Morrison, correspondent of the ondon Times at Pekin, will be reprinted in everal successive issues of "The Living Age," beinning with November 17.

A new candidate for favor in the field of the collar magazine is the Ledger Monthly which appears in new form with its November number. In he same number begins the publication of a new tory by Hall Caine, "Jan, the Icelander."

"The Rulers of the South," by Marion Crawford, s a treatment of Sicily, Calabria and Malta in the ame scholarly and fascinating manner in which is "Ave Roma Immortalis" dealt with the eternal ity. It will be issued in a few days by the Macnillan Company.

Vol. 1, No. 1, of "Good Cheer, a Monthly Magaine for Cheerful Thinkers," (Forbes & Co., Boston) is as cheerful as its name. Nixon Waternan an optimistic poet, is its editor and among ts first contributors are Hezekiah Butterworth and Opie Read.

"The Book of Saints and Friendly Beasts," by Abbie Farwell Brown (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), tells in the clearest and most attractive s yle the numerous stories which tradition has handed down concerning those saints who have made friends with beasts and birds and have been protected by them.

Professor Reinsch, of the University of Wisconsin, author of "World Politics," has written a volume on "Colonial Government," which will be ssued shortly by the Macmillans. The character of the former work is sufficient warrant for expecting a vigorous treatment of the colonial

Students of the civilization of India and especially those interested in the women of India, should note the recent publications by the Revell Company of two important valumes: "The Story of Pundita Ramabai," by Helen S. Dyer, and "The Wrongs of Indian Womanhood," by Mrs. Marcus B.

Dr. W. A. P. Martin, than whom there is no higher authority on Chinese affairs, will publish a volume on the "Siege of Pekin" about December 1. Dr. Martin was himself one of the besieged-which was hard luck for him but fortunate for his readers. The book will come from the press of Fleming H. Revell Company.

The prospectus of the Sunday-school Times for the coming year shows that that excellent and unique journal intends to render itself still more popular by the double means of improving its quality and reducing its price. Single subscriptions are now $1.00. Among the announced contributors of the next year are Israel Zangwill, Newell Dwight Hillis, ex-President Timothy Dwight and a long list of other eminent names.

Young writers who have as yet no fame but hope for it, may take courage from the example of the author of "The Helmet of Navarre" which has been running in the Century since August and will continue through several months of next year. It is the author's maiden effort and the acceptance of so pretentious and space-filling a work from an unknown pen is sufficient evidence that the best magazines are not closed to the new writers-provided they can write.

John Wanamaker, who has hitherto come as near selling everything as one man could, has extended his operations one degree farther by the purchase of Everybody's Magazine. The December number is the first under the new management. Its table of contents includes everything from golf to politics, with ghost stories and bear stories (one of William Major's) by the way. It will undoubtedly be a dangerous rival to the other dollar magazines.

Several of the best pictures of Puvis de Chavannes will be reproduced in color accompanied by an essay by John La Farge in the Christmas Scribner's. Lovers of art who remember the noble frescoes of this eminent colorist in the Pantheon at Paris, or his Pauvre Pecheur in the Luxemburg, will await these reproductions with interest, not to say impatience. The same number will contain a "story of a misunderstood dog and a trapper who was his friend," by Henry Van

A new department of St. Nicholas, which now has the honor of being the only children's monthly magazine of any consequence in the world, is "Nature and Science." Its object is not only to stimulate an interest in such subjects among its youthful readers, but to relieve some of the strain which juvenile curiosity sometimes puts upon the patience as well as the store of general information of parents and other "grown-ups." This is, from the point of view of both child and parent, a worthy

The record for large circulation of novels has been broken several times in the last few years. A new record for quick circulation is made by Marie Corelli's "Master-Christian," of which 150,000 copies were sold before the first copy appeared from the press, and three books from the Macmillan press which ran into large second editions on the day of their first publication: "In the Palace of the King," by Marion Crawford; "Richard Yea and Nay," by Maurice Hewlett, and "Who Goes There?" by B. K. Benson.

The Atlantic Monthly, which we have always considered as pre-eminently the magazine for people who think and who are not to be attracted by the cheap pictures and clap-trap features which characterize some of the so-called popular magazines, issues an announcement for 1901 which will be gratifying to all its old admirers. Professor Woodrow Wilson, of Princeton, will write the introductory article in a series on "The Reconstruction Period in the Southern States." The single articles which are announced are too numerous to mention, but they are such as will make the magazine in the future, as in the past, thoughtful without being heavy.

The weekly journal, "Science," published by the Macmillan Company, has recently entered upon a new era in its career in being adopted as the official organ of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. It will continue to be as heretofore under the management of an editorial committee composed of about twenty of the most eminent scientific specialists in the country.

The work of Paul Laurence Dunbar, who was at first known as W. D. Howells' colored protege, but has now acquired an independent reputation of his own as a writer of poetry and short stories, is always interesting in writing of negro life. And Mr. Kemble is always interesting in his drawings of the same subject. They appear together in a Christmas story in the December Delineator.

It should not be forgotten that Henry James, although he has of late devoted himself almost entirely to sociological fiction, has done some of his best work in descriptions of travel. Those into whose hands falls his "Little Tour in France," issued in an illustrated holiday edition by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., will be happily reminded of this fact. The "Httle tour" was made soon after he went abroad to reside and he visited a score or more of the ancient and picturesque towns of Provence, the country beloved of Balsac, Daudet, Maupassant and Felix Gras.

Hamilton W. Mabie's "William Shakespeare: Poet, Dramatist and Man" (The Macmillan Company) is a work of singular and almost unique completeness. Vast as is the library of Shakespeare literature, one may seek long and in vain for a single volume which presents so many of the things which really make for an intelligent understanding of the man Shakespeare, his environment and his work. Mr. Mabie not only tells the story of his life, but reveals to us the Shakespeare country as it is now and as it was then, sets forth the local influence which worked upon him and the literary influence of his time. And the whole is illustrated not only with excellent and abundant pictures but with copious references to earlier and later literature.

Our Budget.

- -"O give thanks unto the Lord."
- -"Be ye thankful, all ye peoples."
- -"It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord."
- -- "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."
- -Let there be crowded churches and hearty praise to God on Thanksgiving day for all our national and individual blessings.
- -We give as large space as possible this week to the book feature without crowding out the regular departments entirely, and trust that our readers will find much to interest and instruct
- -The report of the Indiana preachers' "retreat," held at Indianapolis, Nov. 20, 21, will appear next week.
- -The third article in W. J. Lhamon's series, "The Christ in Contrast," is postponed until next week to make room for the contents of our book
- -The receipts for Foreign Missions for the week ending Nov. 22, amounted to $5,246.29, or a gain of $5,149.59 over the corresponding week last year. If the friends of the Foreign Society continue in their well-begun liberality, the Twentieth Century Fund of $200,000 will certainly be reached during this missionary year.
- -The Foreign Society was the happy recipient during the past week of another gift of $5,000 on the Annuity Plan. It came from the same man who a few days ago gave $10,000. This man does not want his name known. He has been a liberal supporter of the society for many years. He is administering on his own estate.
- -The twenty fourth annual Missouri Y. M. C. A. Convention will be held at Moberly, Mo., Dec. 6-9. Prominent workers from other states will be present, as well as the Y. M. C. A. leaders of Missouri. The Wabash Railroad Company and the citizens of Moberly are erecting a handsome building for the Railroad Young Men's Christian Association of that city, which will probably be completed by the time of the convention.
- —A Bible Teachers' College is to be inaugurated at Mountclair, N. J., the first session of which will be held from January until June, 1901. Over three hundred studies and lectures will be given by men of recognized eminence in various departments of biblical learning. Among the many well known names in the prospectus are those of Dr. Marcus Dods, of Edinburgh, Scotland; Professor Ira M. Price, of the University of Chicago; Dr. Patton, President of Princeton University, and John Henry Barrows, President of Oberlin College. Studies and lectures will be given on the Four Gospels, the Epistles to the Hebrews, Assyriology, Isaiah, etc. Such popular presentations by men of the highest scholarship can but be most helpful to all who attend.
- -Our esteemed contemporary, the West Virginia Christian, has a most annoying and un comfortable way of stating our missionary obligations. After exhibiting the fact that the evangelists of that state won sixty converts last year at a total expense of $762, which is $12.70 apiece, whereas the contributions for State Missions averaged 72 cts. per member, it says: "We pretend to believe that a soul is of more value than all the world; yet when they may be had for cold cash at the rate of $12.70 each, we tighten our purse strings and in effect say, I will give you 7½ cts. for one." The West Virginia Christian must be a mean sheet and we advise all those who enjoy shirking their missionary obligations to stop their subscription to it.

- -The Universalists, whether or not their plea, as we look at it, affords a logical basis for missionary zeal, are feeling the impulse toward expansion which is moving several of the other denominations in this end of the century. They are raising a twentieth century fund for church extension and are preparing to enlarge their missionary work in Japan.
- -Our contemporary, the Christian Instructor (Presbyterian), resents a suggestion that certain psalms which are never used be omitted from the church song book, and cites the curse which is pronounced on him who takes away from Goo's word. If "taking away" means printing and binding in a separate volume, how about "taking away" the Book of Psalms from the Bible and putting it in a separate volume?
- -The United Brethren are celebrating this year, the centeninal of their organization as a religious body. Their founder, Philip William Otterbeig, was born in Germany in 1726, and died in 1813. The religious movement led by Otterbein began in the German Reformed Church in Baltimore. In 1774 there occurred a separation from the older church; in 1789 a constitution was adopted by Otterbein's congregation, and in 1800 a complete separation from the parent body and organization of the church of the United Brethren in Christ were effected. Their present membership is 245,000.
- -- "We are grown too big to be any longer small," says the Universalist Leader, in speaking of the denomination which it represents. The exhortation is a good one; it is, perhaps, even better for us than for those for whom it was intended. In the first place it suggests that it is quite possible for a religious body to be big in numbers and wealth, and small in all others respects-which is very true. In the second place it suggests that this, whenever it exists, is an abnormal condition -which is also true. We are big with our million members and with our wealth, in spite of our attempts to excuse our illiberality on the plea of poverty. Shall we not also be great in spirituality, in depth and breadth of Christian sympathy, in works of practical charity, in missionary activity, and in that education which makes for the highest and most Christian culture.
- -The congregation at Alvin, Tex., whose church building was completely destroyed by the storm of September 8, is in sore need of assistance. They have received already about $500, which is only one-fourth of what they need and ought to have. The town is an important one, midway between Houston and Galveston, We have received a photograph marked "The Chris tian Church at Alvin." It should rather be called the site of the Christian Church, for all that remains is a vacant lot strewn with shingles and here and there a casual timber. Extraordinary needs necessitate extraordinary appeals. In this day of organized effort, we find it best, under ordinary circumstances, to make our missionary and benevolent contributions through societies, but at the time of the Galveston flood the stream of human sympathy barst the banks of its accustomed channels and dealt directly with the sufferers, and we may well do the same now with the church at Alvin. All contributions should be sent to J. M. Keeton, Treasurer Building Committee, Alvin, Tex.

The period of enforced leisure which has been brought upon our missionaries in China while they have been refugees in Shanghai, is bringing forth some valuable literature. With the exception of Mr. Bentley, the F. C. M. S. workers do not speak the Shanghai dialect and hence cannot work directly among the Chinese in this district. Dr. Macklin is translating into Chinese the biographies of Thomas Jefferson and William the Silent, which will be published by the society for the Diffusion of Christian Literature, and is writing much for Chinese magazines. It is entirely proper that those who do not like the society's way should have a chance to do some missionary work in their own way. It involves a good deal of extra trouble and expense, of course, secause the missionary has to leave his work and come back (Bro. Cook has been back three times) to solicit support Still they ought to have the chance and we hope they will support him as he deserves

John G. Miller, of Elk Mills, Tennessee, has invented a form of steam engine, which in his belief, is bound to revolutionize the whole steam engine business. Its distinctive feature is that it "a pad the wheel instead of valves." Of course the turbine-wheel engine has been invented and re-inv-nted at brief but regular intervals for a good many years. It made the largest stir when, a few years ago, it was reported that a telegraph operator in Dak ta had sold a patent on such an invention to an English syn icate for several million dollars. Indiana Christian Ministers' "Re. treat."

The "Retreat" of Indiana Christian preachers was held at the Central Christian Church, Indianapolis, Nov. 20, 21, 1900. There were fully fifty preachers in attendance, about half of whom live in Indianapolis and Irvington. The out-of town preachers were: A. J. Frank and E B. Widger, Columbus; Chas. S. Medbury, Angola; Chas. R. Hudson and Willis M. Cunningham, Franklin; L. I. Mercer, Richmond; J. L. Brady, Rensselaer; Oscar E. Kelley, Clinton; W. J. Russell and W. Stairs, Rushville; E. L. Frazier, Marion; Urban C. Brewer, Danville; L. V. Barbre, Greencastle; M. W. Harkins, Anderson; H. A. Turney, Brooklyn; Alpionso Burns, Hartsville; C. G. Cantrell, Cincinnati, O.; J. H. Garvin, Cambridge City; S. J. Tonlinson, Eikhart; Amzi A'water and T. J. Clark, B.o mington; W. D. Star, Noblesville; T. J. Legg, Logansport; J. O. Rose, Lebanon; E. Finley Mahan, Shelbyville. A large number of other brethren sent regrets that they could not attend.

The meeting opened with a most delightful devotional session led by Jabez Hall, dean of the Butler Bible College, the entire afternoon session being devoted to this love feast. At the Tuesday evening session, after another inspiring service of devotion, a conference on our educational problem was held. This conference was continued through the Wednesday morning session. After the freest discussion of the educational situation in Indiana, it was agreed that the greatest need of our cause in Indiana is an institution properly equipped for the education of the ministry, and that the outlook for securing such an institution is most hopeful. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

We, your Committee on Recommendations from the Educational Session of the "Retreat," report

Recognizing the greatest need of our cause in Indiana to be a thoroughly equip d institution for the education of the Christian Ministry; and

Owing to the propitious opportunities presented to the Trustees of Bu ler Bible College to control such an institution by raising for iself Endow-ment Fund of One Hundred Thousand Dollars:

Be it Resolved, That we recommend to the Brotherhood of Indiana to immediately raise the One Hundred Toousand Dollars Endowment as a Twentieth Century Movement;

Further, Be it Resolved, That we unreservedly endorse the Bible College Financial Secretaries, Brethren W. D. Starr and Amzil Atwater, and pledge our most hearty co-operation.

Fraternally submitted,

L. I. MERCER, Richmond.

C. C. Rowlison, Indianapolis. Com. C. R. Hudson, Franklin.

It is believed that the organization of a Twentieth Century Movement among the Disciples of Indiana for the Endowment of the Butler Bible College is to prove one of the most significant undertakings in the history of the Disciples in the State. The Bible College is entirely independent of the Butler College of Arts, except that the latter furnishes the former rooms, light and fael free, and the pay for a full professorship in the Bible College. It is proposed to put $100,000 endowment fund into the hands of the trustees for the equipment of a thorough school for training men for the ministry. The faculty as now organized consists of Jabez Hall, Dean; John Mc-Kee, Professor of Hebrew; C. B. Coleman, Professor of Church History. Indiana must have more well-trained ministers, and hence this school is essential. The Conference also determined to urge the hearty co-operation of the preachers of the state in support of the Indiana Christian Missionary Society, and proposed a great rally of all our forces at the State Convention in Anderson noat May.

FREE TO SUFFERERS.

The New Cure for Kidney, Bladder and Uric Acid Troubles.

Almost everybody who reads the newspapers is sure to know of the wonderful cures made by Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy.

It is the great medical triumph of the nineteenth century; discovered after years of scientific research by Dr. Kilmer, the eminent kidney and bladder specialist, and is wonderfully successful in promptly curing kidney, liver, bladder and uric acid troubles.

Swamp-Root has been tested in so many ways, in hospital work, in private practice, among the helpless, too poor to purchase relief, and has proved so successful in every case, that a special arrangement has been made by which all readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST who have not already tried it, may have a sample bottle sent free by mail; also a book telling more about Swamp Root and how to find out if you have kidney or bladder trouble. When writing mention reading this generous offer in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and send your address to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. The regular fifty-cent and one-dollar sizes are sold by all first-class druggists.

In closing the "Retreat" all joined hands in token of the sacred fellowship of the Christian ministry. To estimate the good accomplished in this assembly is impossible. The sentiment was often expressed that it would be profitable for our preachers everywhere to hold similar meetings for prayer and conference. Who is sufficient for this ministry without the sense of the presence of God and of the holy fellowship with his co-CARLOS C. ROWLISON. workers!

Lynchburg has just had the best revival in the history of the church; 73 were added to the saved. F. F. Bullard is the pastor and Sister Bullard is associate.

Roanoke has had a mighty shaking of dry bones. W. H. Book began with the pastor, Cephas Shelburn, on October 22 and closed on November 9, with 65 added. The house would not hold half that came. Election night gave him's crowded house and eight came forward at the invitation.

Group No. 3, Southeastern district, F. O. Robertson, Chairman, Maceo, Va., is still without a pastor. They want a man badly and a fine field is open to some man who is willing to work.

Bro, Shelnutt, of Georgia, has been called as district evangelist and we expect to hear that the Southeastern has taken on new life. This is the ripest field in the state.

W. R. Carter, formerly of Missouri, is the new pastor at Newport News.

The Virginia Christian Missionary Convention was the best in the history of the state. It was grand throughout. Such men as C. P. Williamson, Atlanta, Ga.; Chas. M. Sheldon, Topeka, Kan.; J. H Garrison, editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST; C. A. Young, Charlottesville, Va.; Miss Bessie Farrar, o' India; C. S. Stevenson, of Japan, were on the bill of fare, and to say that every soul was blessed, lifted up, and strengthened is only partly expressive.

A series of meetings has begun in Petersburg. J. C. REYNOLDS.

Preparing For Christmas.

Of all our holidays, none is so generally celebrated as Christmas. Everybody respects it, more or less. People prepare for it weeks and even months ahead, and make of it the chiefest day for enjoyment, good fellowship and cheer of all the year.

It is now only four weeks until Christmas, and already we are feeling the first glow of Christmas. Millions of hearts are growing warmer as their owners select or prepare gifts for their loved ones. Mysterious packages are being smuggled into the home and hid away in the depths of the bureau drawer, where bright little eyes will not too soon dissover them.

To a great many persons the Christmas season is a time of perplexity. These persons are vexed with the problem: "What shall we choose as gifts for our friends?" They delight to give gifts, but they dread the ordeal of struggling through crowded stores, where there are so many different articles to choose from that the choice is made all the harder. To all who are so perplexed we desire to make this suggestion: No gift is more appreciated by most people than a good book

To relieve our patrons of the perplexing problem of what to select and to save them the trouble of struggling through crowded stores, we have prepared our special catalogue, 29, which we style Special Christmas Catalogue. It is a handsome little booklet of sixteen pages, with colored cover of special design, in which are listed between two hundred and three hundred books which are suitable for Christmas gifts. We have not confined ourselves to religious works or to our own publications. We have included fiction, poetry, biography, travel, adventure, etc. We have listed books for the young and the old. There is a fine list of books especially for boys and girls. A prominent feature in the catalogue is a fine line of Bibles. We have prepared an attractive list of works of fiction, including the works of such authors as Kipling, Hawthorne, Verne, Doyle, Hope, Irving, Barrie, Stevenson, Caine, etc., etc.

Our patrons will find it to their advantage to order their Christmas books from us. Our book trade is very large, and rap'dly growing, and we can afford to plan for a smaller profit on each book sold than can smaller dealers and publishers, whose trade is less extensive. The prices in this catalogue are surprisingly low. For example, we offer a list of over one hundred different volumes by the greatest authors, all handsom-ly bound in cloth, illuminated in gilt, for only fifty cents per volume!

We have aimed to send a copy of this catalogue to every subscriber to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. If any have not received it let them notify us, and a copy will be sent immediately. We urge our patrons to send us their orders as soon as possible, and so relieve, to some extent, the tremendous rush which is certain to come just before Christmas. During the latter part of December the postal service and the express companies are so overworked that annoying delays are apt to occur. Therefore send your orders in early and be certain that you will suffer no disappointment. Address, always, the Christian Publishing Co, 1522 Locust Street, St Louis, Mo.

Alexander Campbell's Theology, by W. E. Garrison, the most recent book issued by the Christian Publishing Company, is already receiving high commendation from many of our leading men and best thinkers. It is a handsome volume of 302 pages, worthy in every respect a place in the library of every preacher and thinking Disciple. Price, $1.00. Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis.

C. W. B. M. Day.

The time set apart by our National Board for C. W. B. M. Day is near at hand, and every low auxiliary should by this time have its plane we matured. Never before in our history has the been so great a need of presenting our work to th churches as at the present: and never before we there so much to encourage us as the prospec now before us. Look at the doors opened to during the past year. There is the Moorehes School with its limitless opportunities for making stalwart Christian men and women of the por white class of Kentucky. There is the Negr Education and Evangelization work, lately mad over to us by the Home Mission Board. Ou cities, Chicago and San Francisco, are calling for help to evangelize their millions. The splendi opening in Bayamon, Porto Rico, must be full met. Already thirty children are under the car of our faithful matron, Mrs. Follen. All this in th home land, to say nothing of the calls that com to us from India and Jamaica. Shall we send the si new missionari s to anseer the urgent call dear Sister Greybeil? Already two men and the wives are ready to go, but the means are lacking

The solution of these and other problems depends largely on how our work is presented of C. W. B. M. Day. MRS A. J. MARSHALL, Constantinople.

We left Vienna Saturday at nine A. M., on a limited train and found ourselves the next morning in the uninviting land of the Turk—whirling along at times through bold, bleak, barren wastes, then across level plains poorly tilled, and again over extensive pasture lands, spotted ev-rywhere with corrals made of sticks, brush, stone or sods, and also with the ruins of ancient towns or villages. One look convinced us that we had reached the Orient. Everywhere was the stamp of past ages.

Our baggage was examined three times, and our passports called for as often. When we did finally reach Constantinople, we were fined 20 piasters (84c) each, because we did not get them signed by some Turkish consul before entering the Empire. "There is no lovelier scene on earth," says Murray, "than that which opens up before the traveler as he approaches Constantinople from the Sea of Marmora." Nor did we find it much less animating on land. Bro. Shishmanian, our beloved mis sionary at Constantinople, met us at the depot and in spite of all protests, would have us accompany him to his home, where we met his lovely and devoted family and partook of an elegant breakfast. We visited the mission school, met Bro. and Sister Chapman, who received us royally, attended Sunday-school and church services on Sunday, each one speaking a few minutes through an interpreter. and with thankful hearts and tearful eyes we blessed the Lord for the sweet communion and familiar tunes—though sung in an unknown tongue -in a strange land. Together we sang, each in his own language, "My Faith Looks up to Thee," "Wonderful Words of Life," "Sweet Bye and Bye" and 'God Be with You till We Meet Again.

The Ottoman Empire dates from the 13 h century, and according to Statesman's Year Book, '99, has a population of 38 790,736, and covers an area of 1,576,677 square miles, lying partly in Europe, partly in Asia and partly in Africa. Constantinople, capital of the Empire, occupies the site of ancient Syzantium which was founded in the year 658 B. C., by a band of Greeks from Megara who, tradition says, were guided by the oracle of Apollo at Delphi and settled on the promontory now occupied by the Seraglio. Constantine male it the capital of the Roman Empire in 330 A. D. Its history is almost a record of its sieges-by Persian , Romans, Huas, Slave, Persians again, and Avars; Arabs, once a year for seven years; twice afterwards by Arabs within a century. Then by Bulgarians; Russians; and during the Crusades by Germans and French; then in 1261 by Greeks, and finally by the Turks on May 26, 1453.

From all this it will be easily seen that Constantinople, as Bryce says, is "a city not of one nation but of many; a mixture of all sorts of European and Astatic peoples who have been converted to Islam and recruited (down till recent times) by the constant kidnapping of Christian children and the import of slaves from all quarters." "Plenty of them," says Murray, "are ecclesiastics of some kind or other was get their lodging and a little food at the mosques; plenty are more beggars. The great bulk are ignorant and fanatical, dangerous when aroused by their priests, though honest enough fellows when left alone." We found that the best place to get a glimpse of this strange mixture of nationalities was on the New Bridge across the Golden Horn, over which passes an endless, mitl y crowd of every tongue and religion and of every conceivable dress, having nothing in com non, no relations except those of trade, and as our guide said, "Everybody living in perpetual dread of everyoody else" We find that Turkish Christians, Greeks, Armenians and Bulgarians agree on just one thing, and that is to hate each other just as they all hate the Turks. There are papers published here in Arabic, Armenian, Bulgarian, English, French, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, Persian, Spanish, Tursish, Turkish written in Armenian character and Turkish written in Greek character. But the censors of the Sultan (one or two over each paper) have paralyzed the press and deprived it of all authority on matters of fact as well as of opinion. For example, when King Humbert was assassinated the censors cut that word out of all reports and the papers here said: "King Humbert suddenly died of heart failure," and our own missionaries knew no better until Americans arrived and related the facts. In the preface of a new Armenian Hymn Book, published by an American firm, were these words: "Remember the old is not always the best." And the cens r suppressed the book until that offensive sentence was

We first visited Galata Tower, called in the Middle Ages Tower of Christ. It is round and massively built, is 150 feet high, about 40 in diameter and was erected in 1348, probably upon the ruins of an earlier Byzantine tower. From this point tourists gain the best general panoramic view of the ci y and of the three parts-Pera, Stambul and Skutari, into which the Bosporus and Golden Horn divide it. This view of the Golden Horn beggars description. Huge fron-clads, men of war, and Turkish coasters flying the red flag and crescent were lying at anchor within a cable's length of the shore; passenger steamers from nearly every country of Europe were moored to the quays or buoys before them; and hundreds of caiques, each one manned with one or two Turks, were flitting everywhere over rippling waters of the deepest blue.

From here we went to the Seraglio, the first place visited by all tourists, because of the scenes that have been enacted within its walls. It con tains terraced gardens, groves of cypress, imperial palaces and many kiosks and mosques. We entered through the Sublime Porte, meaning in Arabic "The Imperial Gate," which is a high semicircular arch bearing an Arabic inscription. Here is the Treasury—the two doors of which are opened with great ceremony, revealing three rooms with galleries, wherein are kept the robes of state and some of the oldest, richest and most valuable relics, the trophies of ancient wars. Here also is the Imperial Museum of Antiquithes, in the Chinlli Kiosk, one of the oldest Turkish buildings, erected in the form of a Greek cross. It contains most valuable relics from ancient cities; "gold from Troy, Phenicia and Babylon," works of Greek and Roman sculptors; and the Himyaritic and Palmyrene monuments.

The New Museum has five rooms which contain the Sidon Sarcophagi (4th century B.C) which, with the Assyrian. Chaldean, Hittite and other antiquities, form one of the most interesting collections on earth. In one tomb at Sidon con aining seven chambers were found, "Alexander's," the "Mourner's," the "Satrap's," the "Lycion" and other sarcophagi. From another was taken that of Taboith, king of Sidon, whose "sons or father's" (?) sarcophagus we saw in the Louvre at Paris. Here also is the Imperial Munt, the Armory and Private Library of the Sultan, near which we saw a fine large stone baptistry, with a Greek cross inside, thus p'acing it in about the days of Constantine (306-337 A. D).

From here we went to the Mosque of St. Sophia, which stands near by, and is the principal Mosque of Stambul. It was originally the Cathedral church of ancient Constantinople. Three buildings have been erected here bearing the same name. The first was begun by Constantine and finished and dedicated by Constantius, his son, Feb. 15, 360; this was burned by the mob when John Chrysostom was exited, 404. The second church was built by Theodosius II, in 415 and burned January 15, 532.

The corner stone of the present church was laid by Justinian, February 23, 532, and was dedicated December 26, 537. It is built in the form of a Greek cross, 235 by 250 feet, the dome being 180 feet high; "the most perfect and most beautiful church," says Ferguson, "which has yet been erected by any Christian people." The building was superintended by the Emperor, who employed 100 architects, under each of whom were placed 100 masons, 5,000 on each side, and was completed in five years and ten months. The lowest estimate of its cost is one million sterling. There is a legend that "an angel appeared to the Emperor three times and gave the plan, the name and the final funds for the completion of this wonder of the Middle Ages." "The walls and arches were constructed of bricks and reveled with marbles, the variety and magnificence of which surpaseed all bounds."-Murray. There are about 200 pillars of every variety of marble, granite and porphyry, gathered from the temples of antiquity and from every quarter of the globe. Here are pillars from the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, Temple of the Sun at Basibec and others from Athens and Delos. When Justinian entered the church after it was completed, he exclaimed: "Glory to God who hath counted me worthy to complete such awork. Solomon, I have surpassed thee!"

The Mosque of Sultan Ahmed I is situated on the southeast side of the Hippodrome and is surrounded by a large court plant-d with trees and with its six minarets, colleges, kitchens and tombs forms an imposing structure. It is the only mosque in the Empire with six minarets. Mecca had but six when this was built, but a seventh was added there that it might surpass all. Two of us visited the renowned Mosaic Mosque which is so exceed ingly interesting because of its mosaics and its plan, of both of which space forbids a description. There are in all 230 mosques and 500 mesjids (chapels) in the city.

Adjoining the Sultun Ahmed Mosque is the Hippadrome, which is 1,200 or 1,300 feet in length and 600 feet wide and was built after the Circus of Maximus at Rome Here Emperors were proclaimed and victorious generals were received in honor; here criminals were beheaded and heretics burned; here athletic sports were held and wild animals exhibited. The historian has said that "the Spina of the Hippodrome was the axis around which the Byzantine world revolved." On this spot in 532 occurred the struggle between Justinian the Great and the rebellious factions of the circus, which deluged the sands of the arena with the blood of 30,000 citizens. The four famous bronze horses of Lysippus which now adorn the front of St. Mark's Church at Venice formerly stood here. The Egyptian Obelisk of Theodosius, brought from Heliopolis, still stands in the north end of the circus and is 60 feet high. Here stands also the Serpent Column, 20 feet high, formed of three bronze serpents. The bodies are twisted spirally, tail downwards and the heads spreasing outward once supported the golden tripod in the Temple at Delphi. The h ads are gone. Tradition says Mohammed II when entering Constantinople struck off the under ja v of one of the serpents with his ax. We saw a portion of one of the heads in the Imperial Museum.

The Seven Towers built by Mohammed II in 1457 are at the southwest corner of the city on the banks of the Marmora, where the land and sea walls meet. This was once a state prison like the Tower of London and the Bastille in Paris, but is no longer used as such. Three of the seven towers have nearly disappeared and the whole structure is dilapidated. The towers were 200 feet high and within their massive walls seven Sulta s have lost their lives and innumerable less illustrious people. In this tower foreign embassadors were imprisoned upon the Porte's declaring war against the states they represented. The French embassador in 1798 was the last victim of barbarism. "The Place of Heads," where the executions took place, the "Well of Blood," where the heads were thrown, the "Dungeons," the prisons for the condemned, and the "Rocky Cavern" where they were put to the torture, were all pointed out to us.

The Burnt Column brought from Rome once stood 120 feet high and was surmounted by a beautiful bronze statue of Apollo representing Constantine. It is made of porphyry but the many fires through which it has passed have greatly damaged it. Here the Emperor attended an annual feast and all public decrees were read at its base. Fires here are frequent and very destructive, because of the very narrow streets and the light, inflammable materials of the houses. As many as 2,000 homes and shops have burned within a few hours. Great precautions are now made to prevent them. Watchmen are stationed day and night in three towers-the Galata, Seraskes and

PENELOPE'S EXPERIENCES I. England; II. Scotland

By Kate Douglas Wiggin. Holiday Edition. With 108 illustrations by Charles E Brock. 2 vols., 12mo, handsomely bound

These volumes are uncommonly attractive. both as literature and as art. They include Mrs. Wiggin's inimitable accounts of Penelope and her companions in England and Scotland, and are easily among the most humorous and fascinating books in modern literature. Mr. Brock, a well-known English artist, has illustrated them with great skill and humor. They are quite sure to be prime favorites this Holiday season.

A LITTLE TOUR IN FRANCE

By Henry James. Holiday Edition. With about seventy Illustrations by Joseph Pennel. Crown 8vo, handsomely bound, $3.00. This is a delightful book in which Mr. James describes in a fascinating manner a leisurely tour which took in scores of French cities and towns. Mr. Pennel has illustrated it with rare grace and charm, and this handsome book is peculiarly attractive as a Holiday gift.

THE HOUSE BEHIND CEDARS

By Charles W. Chesnutt, author of "The Conjure Woman" and "The Wife of His Youth." Crown 8vo, $1.50.

Like Mr. Chesnutt's previous books, this novel is a story of the "Color Line." It involves romance, very dramatic incidents and revelations of character; and while its literary charm will attract readers, the deep significance and tragedy of the story will stir a feeling far profounder than mere interest, Kandili, and the minute a fire breaks out a cannon is fired and red flags or balls from the towers signify in what quarter the fire is located. At the same time the swift runners start through the streets at the top of their speed yelling, "Yangin Var" (fire), at the top of their voices; these are followed by the firemen with the fire engines (small boxes on the shoulders of four men) and they too run headlong giving the most fiendish yell imaginable. We have had one experience this week and I sincerely hope there will be no more fires until we get far out at sea. When the firemen reach the conflagration they stop and wait to be hired by the people whose houses are in danger, as well as by the owner of the burning building. A man of authority says: "The police are powerless for good, evil intentloaed men rush into the houses and rob them, pretending to be friends of the family, and they have been known to carry burning coals into the buildings not yet reached by the

Yesterday we visited the Basilica Cistern or "Underground Palace." It is a great subterranean chamber 336 feet long and 182 feet wide and its vanited brick roof rests on 336 columns, arranged in 12 rows of 28 columns each, which are 39 feet high. Many of them have Corinthian capitals. Its structure is ascribed to Constantine and it was enlarged by Justinian. There is about three to five feet of water in it brought from Belgrad.

The "Cistern of 1001 Columns" near the Hippodrome is 195 feet long and 167 feet wide. The roof is supported by 212 pillars 27 feet high. This cistern is dry and was occupied by Armenian silk workers, 50 of whom were killed here in the massacre of 1895. Looking from my window where I am now seated I can see one section of the city where over 1,200 Armenian men were murdered at that same time. The women and children were spared.

At the south end of the Hippodrome is the Museum of Ancient Costumes, or of the Janissaries. Here are 110 wooden effigies clothed in the apparel of that strong body of soldiers composed of Christian prisoners compelled to fight for Mohammed. Finally Turks were admitted and the Janissaries became the controlling power, dethroning and executing several Sultans, and making and executing laws at their pleasure. They met their master in Mohammed II, the reformer, who defeated them is battle, killing 8,000, which was followed by the wholesale slaughter and banishment of 12,000 more, thus wiping them forever from off the earth. Here are seen the Sheikh-al-Islam; viziers, pashas, commanders, water-carriers, Sultan's dwarfs, his surgeon, his executioner, white and black eunuchs and representatives of many trades and professions.

I had heard and read much of the dogs of Constantiaople, but there are thousands more than I expected to see. I just now counted 20 from my window, and standing on one street corner I counted 34 They are protected by the government, the Mohammedans believing that if they feed these dogs where there is sickness in the family, they will carry off the sins and hence the sickness. They are the scavengers and "City Board of Health." They have the right of way and you walk around. They have their quarters and know their boundaries and woe to the cur that dares to trespass. But the nocturnal howling and barking of these poor, ugly, sore, half-starved, dirty, maimed, flea-centered, mange-ridden, snarling yellow dogs is almost unbearable. A single railroad enters this city. There are but three miserable horse car lines, with a man running before blowing a little brass horn. Telephones and electric lights are forbidden, the Sultan fearing a conspiracy might be wrought more easily through them. If an Armenian or Greek becomes too wealthy or popular, the Sultan exiles him and confiscates his possessions, hence, the city is growing continually

There are 180 Khans, originally for traveling merchants and now occupied by a motley crowd of every color, tongue, country, condition and religion. There are miles and miles of bazars or shops, where nearly every conceivable article can be had. These are closed on Friday by the Mohammedans, on Saturday by the Jews and Lord's day by Christians. We visited a colony of 25 poor, miserable, pitiable lepers, located in an old cemetery, with nothing but the abode of the dead about them, and no freedom save through death before them. A heart-rending sight indeed! Friday we saw the Sultan, who was guarded by 25,000 soldiers and cavalrymen, that he might go about 40 rods from his palace to the mosque to worship. No one in the Empire is allowed to call his resi dence a palace but H-I-M (the Sultan). By accident a friend learned from the police reports that we are being watched or shadowed by detectives, and we only hope that their pleasure in this matter is equal to ours. We leave at four P. M. today by boat for Beirut (992 miles) with a sincere prayer to God that the Eclipse of the Son of Rightecusness may pass away from this land, the cross replace the crescent, when again a nation that sits in darkness shall have seen a great light.
